SAN FRANCISCO NEWS LETTER

California Advertiser.

Vol. LII.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1896.

Number 1.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT, 606-608-610 Merchant street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at the "World" Building, Room 147 (E. Katz, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

A PROPOS the recent effort to bring the Republican National Convention to San Francisco it is suggested that such movements give some individuals an opportunity to purchase a little cheap notoriety and lay it up as a claim upon the gratitude of the party. There are few men who have ever been delegates that do not publish the fact when ever they walk out among their fellows. After all, delegations and conventions are but the showy autumn leaves upon the tree of politics to be blown away by the first gust of a windy campaign.

THE Examiner pretends to be astounded because a rich young man prefers horse racing to politics as a side occupation. Why not? Let a rich young man go into politics, and besides being obliged to keep company that he would turn away from in a poolroom, he will have the press giving its energies to libeling him. And the Examiner would not consent to be left in the race. With rich old men it is different. They are forgiven a fondness for Senatorial togas as readily as young women are a weakness for sealskins. And nobody is very curious about the means either take to get them.

THERE is a wretched and unfortunate creature creeping along our streets selling lead pencils. Both legs are gone from the knees down and he presents a pitiable appearance. He has travelled here from the East, so the daily papers say. San Francisco seems to be the jumping off place for the maimed, the halt and the blind. It's a shame to have such objects of misery on the public pavements. The city is in duty bound to place persons of such misfortune in the Alms House at once. Several years ago, we had a visit from six cripples on wheels; they had found their way wretchedly, and probably departed in as unhappy a condition.

THE brethren who wear the cowl are holy, of course, but still they are human. And being human it is not to be expected of them that they will not need to pray for grace to restrain a tendency to exult, even as if they were of the worldly, over the peculiar afflictions that have been visited upon their enemies. Here is Price, the publisher of the A. P. A. Magazine, arrested for disseminating obscene literature, and the Rev. Dr. Brown, mighty in discourse at A. P. A. meetings, accused by a conscienceless old woman of having surrendered to the charms of a young one. The Lord, for the moment, seems to be against the A. P. A.

STRANGE that it does not occur to Dr. Dille that he was tided in upon a New York City wave of reform; that he tops that wave on account of his lack of weight rather than his ability to swim. He is of the drift wood, and not a big log either. He would do for firewood, but there is not the possibility of a plank in the whole timber of him, knots included. Recently he told an intelligent audience about a man using a wart on his neck for a collar button! The doctor of whatever he gives medicine to was not even talking upon the subject of economy. He is neither eloquent, learned, nor a man of excellent taste. When such a one becomes an apparent leader, of what stuff must his following be? And yet this same plaything of circumstances over which, of course, he has no control, will probably never realize what a great man he was not.

THE brethren of the pulpit have been interviewed as to their views on evolution. The consensus of clerical opinion is that they hope the theory of development is not correct, in which case it is contrary to Scripture. But if correct, and not to be disputed, then a true interpretation of Scripture will show that the inspired writers anticipated Darwin, and that evolution is in entire harmony with Scripture. Faith overcometh all things.

DID President Harrison really agree to turn over the federal patronage of New York, and did he actually make a bargain with Senator Platt to that effect?—that is what the Nation, in New York, asks. Mr. Shermau has made a direct charge that the Indiana Candidate for a second nomination put a certain contract in Steve Elkin's pocket. The Boston Herald, one of the most powerful journals in the country, has made an angry demand, upon Mr. Harrison to say why!

IT seems evident to all the rational citizens of California that Governor Budd was "level-headed" when he made the reorganization in the State Militia, in consolidating the nine regiments scattered about the State into five. All sorts of influence was brought to bear by influential citizens to swerve the Governor from his determination. But, as Hoke Smith would say: "He seen his duty and he done it!" In short, Mr. Budd has backbone, and deserves great credit. It relieved some too hundred officers of their former rank, and "hence the tears." But there is no disputing that while these gentlemen were mustered out, it was a wise and politic undertaking on the part of the Governor to simplify our National Guard and render it soldierlike and efficient.

THE guardian angel of San Francisco's Alms House has been, for the past twelve years, the matron, Mrs. Weaver, wife of the present Superintendent. This lady has made a thorough study of human nature as it comes under her constant inspection. While all are treated with careful impartiality, there are inmates who have been used to luxuries in their youthful prosperity, of which the cruelty of old age and misfortune has now deprived them. These persons have received from the matron that same delicate consideration which has marked her hearty and cheery devotion to any and every one else. In consequence, she is adored by all there. Now, a question of politics has arisen in the Board of Supervisors, and an intimation has been "declared" to dismiss Superintendent and Mrs. Weaver. This would be a sad disgrace to the City and County.

IT seems to be a difficult matter for boards of health and other such bodies to keep within the bounds of their powers. In undertaking to stop the sale of skim-milk in this city, the health authorities have certainly exceeded their jurisdiction. It is clearly not a lawful exercise of the police power to attempt the suppression of traffic in a wholesome article of food, merely because it may be palmed off upon the unsuspecting as something richer or better. It would be entirely proper, however, to require all skimmed milk to be sold as such, and to this end to provide reasonable regulations against imposition on the public. In using all proper means to prevent adulteration or fraudulent substitution, the Board of Health will have the support of the public. But there is a reasonable limit to its functions and powers. When the Board steps beyond that limit, it arbitrarily interferes with legitimate business, and becomes a meddling nuisance.

A CLERGYMAN IN TRIBULATION.

THE sympathy and confidence of this town are due to Dr. Brown, pastor of the First Congregational Church. There was a young woman staying at his house as a guest, and an old woman accused the Doctor of being in love with this damsel within his gates, and the damsel with him. The old woman demanded hush money—not for herself, but for a mysterious third person who has not been found, a Mrs. Harris, so to say—and the Doctor was weak enough to give her $500 on account. He was, however, sufficiently endowed with the wisdom of the serpent to take his accuser's receipt, and after consulting with his deacons, to call in the police. As a consequence Mrs. Mary A. Davidson, who got the $500, is in jail.

Had Dr. Brown been a man of the world he never would have given up that money, but rung for a policeman immediately, innocent or guilty. But a clergyman is peculiarly placed. Notwithstanding the assertion of the Rev. Sydney Smith, that there are three sexes—men, women, and parsons—preachers are male, and they occupy a unique position. In modern times chastity is demanded of them. For one of them to lose his reputation for that is as disastrous to him as if he were a woman. One of the conditions on which his salary is paid him is that he shall be chaste. If a Protestant he is given a wife, if a Catholic he goes without one, but in either case he is expected to walk before the world a model of virtuous conduct. A man in common, secular life would not like, of course, to be accused of the offense imputed to the Rev. Dr. Brown, but if of ordinary courage he would let the public think what it liked, reassure his wife, send the girl home to her parents, and leave the rest to the courts. But his pluck in such circumstances would be as nothing compared with that displayed by the Rev. Dr. Brown. It is no great exaggeration to say that it is a matter of life and death to him. To have a Christian character to maintain is no light burden.

As for Mrs. Davidson, she is in jail, and in all likelihood will go to the penitentiary, unless Dr. Brown should choose to take counsel of his Master and be merciful beyond the mercy of those of this world. There is not one chance in a hundred that her story is true. But while there is that one chance justice requires that everything should be done to enable the old woman to make a defense. She is poor and friendless, and appearances are all against her. Make a violent effort of the imagination, defy probability, and suppose she is telling the truth. Then fancy her case. She has the public against her, the press against her, and the congregation of the Rev. Dr. Brown's church has rallied around him with that enthusiastic loyalty characteristic of congregations. She seems to know the peril of her plight, for she expects to go to San Quentin. There are generous souls in the world. It may be that one of them, with a purse, will rise up and, without passing judgment on Dr. Brown, resolve that this old woman shall be given every opportunity to substantiate her statements if she can, that popular clamor shall not deprive her of her legal right to be considered innocent until her guilt has been proved. The old woman is entitled to a fair show, and she can't have it unless a good Samaritan with money appears.

Dr. Brown has done well to appeal to the police; that is greatly in his favor. But he will do better if he shall express Miss Overman to her parents and give a clearer explanation of why he allowed himself to be blackmailed out of $500 on a foul and false charge.

There will be no war between the United States and England over the Venezuela boundary. Every man of sense who consults his judgment, rather than his passions, believes that. The people of the two nations are civilized, not savages, and they will not fight, therefore, for the mere sake of fighting. War between two such countries, devoted as they are to the arts of peace, is too horrible to be contemplated by any one who knows what war is, who values human life and human happiness, and cherishes the smallest regard for the world's welfare.

The quarrel which has sprung up will, in the end, be beneficial in a good many ways. For one thing, it will cure English statesmen of a pernicious inclination to deal with the United States from the British newspaper point of view. Lord Salisbury is to blame for President Cleveland's hot and belligerent message. It is the misfortune of Lord Salisbury once to have been a journalist, a writer of articles for the Saturday Review, which is as flippant as it is bright and bitter. When his lordship gets his pen in his hand his old newspaper habit returns, and he is more eager to make a point or turn a sarcasm than he is to round an innocuous diplomatic phrase. His response to Secretary Olney, which brought forth the President's vehement message, was worse than ill-considered. It was insulting. Had Secretary of State Olney been a rural contemporary and Lord Salisbury been seated in the editorial chair of the Saturday Review, rebuking and instructing him, he could not have been more offensive in tone—more condescending in his manner of giving the American Secretary of State elementary instruction as to the meaning and scope of the American Monroe Doctrine. It was indefensible in a Prime Minister of England, if quite allowable in an editorial writer for a sneering London weekly, catering to its clientele.

When the fever of resentment on both sides of the water dies down, Lord Salisbury's share in the unhappy business will be given more attention. It may or may not be England's present desire that the United States shall arbitrate her boundary dispute with Venezuela, but it certainly is not the desire of England's people that her monarch for the time being—her Prime Minister—should be a man of Lord Salisbury's caliber—a man who, for the sake of saying smart things, affronts a first-class power and brings war very near.

There is too much common sense in both England and America to permit the concerns of an insignificant South American republic to embroil them in an armed conflict. Lord Salisbury may think it beneath the dignity of a Saturday Reviewer to arbitrate anything, but the British people may be trusted to have a truer perception of what constitutes dignity. They do not want anything which does not of right belong to them, and we think they have confidence in the fairness of the government of the United States—confidence enough to be sure that this government would not take away an inch of territory belonging to Great Britain or give to Venezuela an inch to which she has no title in justice. There is in England, we are persuaded, no deep-seated sentiment against arbitration of this question, whatever Lord Salisbury's proud spirit may lead him to declare. That gentleman's next note to our Government, we venture to prophesy, will be graver and more respectful in tone than was his impudent Saturday Review editorial to Secretary Olney on the Monroe Doctrine. Should it be otherwise—should the Saturday Reviewer's instincts overcome the prudence of the Prime Minister—the English people and the English Parliament will have something to say. Let the alternative be presented of a war with the United States or a change of ministry, and there will be a change of ministry. Lord Salisbury will be a statesman out of a job.

It is to be remembered that the people of England know nothing about the Monroe Doctrine. They are not aware of how much it means to us, and how earnest we are when it is called in question. When they come to understand the situation, as they surely will, a British roar will go up—a roar against war and for arbitration. Lord Salisbury's feelings will cut no figure whatever.

The beauties of the labor-union was recently shown when the manager of the Baldwin found fault with the way the cooking was done. The chef got mad and left. His five assistants dropped their aprons and followed suit. They had to. They expected to see the guests leave the hotel and the manager go into bankruptcy. Instead of that he hired another chef and five more assistants and now nobody finds fault with the cooking. The chef had been getting $200 a month for several years, and now owns houses and lands, but, for a wonder, the Baldwin is not included. The assistants are poor and out of work. Some day a gleam of common sense will enter the brains of laborers, and then all will not allow themselves to be dragged down by the stupidity, or quarrel, or misfortune of one man. When there are no more poor, nor unfortunate, nor unemployed, the strikers may be on top, but never till then.

Preachers.

A Society for the Protection of Preachers appears to be in order. Seeing that black-mailers and other designing persons are constantly laying snares and setting traps for the guileless and unsuspecting clergymen, it behooves the more experienced male and female members of church congregations to organize for the circumvention of these agents of the devil. The crafts and subtleties of unscrupulous women, particularly widows, are especially to be guarded against, and the society should see to it that the advice of the elder Weller to his son is inscribed upon the walls of every minister's study. But no trust is to be placed in precepts; of themselves alone they are insufficient to baffle the arts of the corrupt. Yet rules and regulations are needed for the conduct of priests and deacons in order that they may be hedged about on every side with safeguards. Particularly must pastoral calls be subjected to the most rigid discipline. Pastoral visitation is one of the readiest means of ensnaring the artless divine. The preacher should never be allowed to go unattended upon errands of consolation to the homes of spiritual sisters whose physical well-being may be reported as more or less impaired. It is not sufficient that the apostle shall be pure; he must be shielded from contact with evil; from the net of the adventuress and the pitfall of the blackmailer. To err is human, and society is prone to suspicion. Since the introduction of "steering committees" for the safety of legislators exposed to temptation from lobbyists, many Western statesmen have been preserved to their constituents in all the bloom of innocence and unsullied patriotism. Without such guardianship these law-makers might have fallen by the wayside, and become wholly lost in political sin. If these things be just and seemly for statesmen, how much greater is the need of protection for the pastors. There is more joy in hell and the newspaper offices over a scandal affecting a prominent preacher than rejoicing on earth for the salvation of a thousand souls. The multitude of the ungodly and the profane openly chuckle when the foul shafts of slander are sent flying against the reputation of some one of the Lord's anointed. The way to confound the plotters of iniquity, to heap confusion upon the slanderers, is to so order the goings and the comings of the ministers and stewards that an alibi may always be established, to break down any specific charge of wrong-doing. Let the Society for the Protection of Preachers so contrive its good offices that no clergyman shall ever be alone and helpless, lest some emissary of Satan take him unawares. Let every minister be required to keep a diary in which from day to day and from hour to hour his walks and talks shall be set down, and let it always appear that he was attended by some member of the S. F. T. P. O. P. So shall the wicked be confounded, and the pencil of the interviewer be brought to naught.

The Winter Season
in San Francisco.

Few of the multitude of Eastern people who are accustomed to spend the winter months in Southern California have a correct idea of the mildness of the winter season in San Francisco. If the facts were better known, this city would enjoy no small share of the benefits of the tourist travel that is now confined almost exclusively to the southern part of the State. When Eastern people read of the frosts that have of late threatened with serious injury the orange crop of the southern counties; of bitter winds sweeping down from icy mountains upon the citrus groves; of temperatures as low as four or six degrees below the freezing point at such places as San Bernardino and Riverside, they would be surprised to learn that as far north as San Francisco there had been no freezing cold; that the most delicate flowers have been blooming in our open-air gardens throughout November and December. At this time pansies, roses, violets, heliotrope, geraniums and many other flowers may be seen blooming out of doors in this city. And the bright weather of the holiday season here has certainly not been surpassed in any part of Southern California. Yet our hotels are almost bare of Eastern patrons, and travel sets steadily, as usual, from the East towards Los Angeles. Some organized efforts should be directed, in behalf of this city, towards the widespread advertising in the East of the many advantages and attractions that San Francisco and the surrounding country possess for the winter tourist. Certainly, no town or city in the southern part of the State can compare for a moment with San Francisco in resources for amusement and recreation. Los Angeles is, in fact, dull and tame, contrasted with this metropolis of the Coast. Nor can any spot in all Southern California vie with this in the magnificence and beauty of its natural surroundings. From this point, too, a great number of short excursions may be had to places of interest, such as Monterey, Santa Cruz, San Jose, Napa, Santa Rosa, Sausalito, San Rafael, and a host of others that might be named. For those who enjoy hunting or fishing there is abundance of sport to be found within a day's journey. For riding or driving, coaching, or bicycle excursions, many hundreds of miles of excellent roads are accessible from San Francisco, while in the southern counties good roads are almost unknown. There is, perhaps, a little more sunshine south of the Tehachapi than ordinarily falls to our lot here during the winter months, but in this city there is certainly less frost than is commonly experienced either at Los Angeles or Riverside. In short, the winter climate of San Francisco is a thing to be proud of, and its merits should be heralded far and wide. This is not a matter of boasting, but of business. A large volume of winter tourist travel to this city would mean the expenditure here of hundreds of thousands of dollars, in our hotels, restaurants, and other establishments, all of which would add to the general prosperity.

The Position
the Ministry.

In spite of the fact that the pulpits of our larger churches are occupied by men of the best education and, presumably, moral tendencies, the Church is, as it always has been, the last to join any movement leading towards a betterment of existing social conditions.

This fact either proves that an ecclesiastical education is not always conducive to mental evolution, or that the shepherds of the Lord's sheep fear for their own welfare under any other than the present regime.

The early Church doubtless did much towards the elevating of the people from the condition of dirt and damnation; but now that its various branches have become firmly established, it has settled down to a smug existence, and the average pulpit fighter is content to be a mere shell—echoing the confused murmurs of the Middle Ages.

This attitude has made it painfully apparent to the most casual observer that the ministerial stomach is no more than human. One sometimes hears the complaint made by leading preachers that so few men ever enter the fold, and the cause to which they attribute this is that the present age is too restless or too busy to be much interested in religion.

This is not so. The preachers themselves are to blame for not keeping up with the times. Men and women who read their papers are not inclined to sit for hours in a badly ventilated church listening to a discourse apparently addressed to the spirits of our grandfathers. The watchword to-day in religion, as well as in everything else, is Progress; and it is advisable for our ministers, if they wish to regain the confidence of the people, to awake from their heavy sleep and preach, not the past, but the world as it exists to-day. Such theological pugilists as Father Yorke and the Rev. Ross may for a time amuse the onlookers, but that is all. Such discourses are addressed to the "gods," and the "gods" are not supposed to know much.

To summarily dispose of the whole question, the position of the ministry is remarkably like that of the monkey on a rotten bough, with a deep stream at the far end and an audience of other monkeys above. To attract their attention it is necessary for the wretched thing to caper; and the possibility of the branch breaking, and a consequent fatal immersion, affords matter for grim humor to all save the one most concerned.

Improvement of the

The River Improvement Convention, which is to meet here on the 15th inst., will be composed of Supervisors from counties in the San Joaquin and Sacramento Valleys, and of other prominent citizens of those counties, uniting with representatives of the Chamber of Commerce and the Merchant's Association of this city. The Convention will choose an executive committee, whose duty it will be to promote desired legislation at Washington. The primary object of the movement finding expression in the coming gathering is the improvement of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. This is a matter of importance, and, with the proper effort, a favorable influence on legislation may be had. It must be confessed that California has not, in the past, secured a due share of the Government appropriation for the benefit of rivers and harbors. Of late years, Oregon has enjoyed a great advantage over us in this respect. One reason that has hindered California in this regard is lack of harmony among her representatives at Washington, and another impediment is the jealousy existing between rival localities. The latter cause has, for many years, delayed the construction of a deep-water harbor for the Los Angeles district. San Pedro, Redondo, and Santa Monica are rival localities, and the people of Los Angeles have divided their support among these ambitious places. Had there been unity of sentiment on the subject, Los Angeles would, ere this, have been provided with a safe harbor for deep-water vessels.

But what more directly concerns San Francisco is the improvement of her own harbor by the removal of a number of dangerous rocks, and also the deepening and clearing of the navigable rivers tributary to our system of bays. It is not generally known that it is the work of years, under the present rules governing the action of Congress, to obtain an appropriation for any river or harbor. First there must be adopted a provision for a preliminary survey and report by Government engineers. This is embodied in the general river and harbor bill. And as but one such bill is passed by each Congress, two years or more must elapse before an appropriation can be had for the proposed improvement. Meanwhile, the fate of the appropriation must depend upon the favor of the engineers. In the event of an unfavorable report, no appropriation can be had. At one period the appropriations for unheeded of creeks and sloughs constituted a national scandal, and the river and harbor bill was a matter of log-rolling, pure and simple. Now the appropriations are divided upon a meritorious system, as Government engineers are rarely found wanting in judgment or integrity. But, assuming that all the projects approved by the engineers are worthy of Government aid, the advantages of "push and pull" are still exhibited in the amounts recommended by the Committee on Commerce for the various waterways. It is in this regard that the executive committee to be appointed by the coming convention may do good work. A comprehensive plan of river and harbor improvements for California should be mapped out, with the assistance of Government engineers inclined to give their aid. Then this plan should be diligently urged, through the press and at Washington, until the desired action shall have been secured.

In its deliberations it is to be hoped that the convention will not be bothered by cranks, and that it will not allow itself to be used for the promotion of schemes of purely local benefit. The town of Redding, for example, is ambitious to become a river port. It is situated above a succession of rapids on the Sacramento river, and Major Heuer, the Government engineer having charge of the Sacramento, reported some time ago that the improvement of the river between Red Bluff and Redding would be a waste of public money. It would certainly appear that a Government appropriation would be much more wisely expended in improving the main channels, naturally navigable, than in the attempt to bring a small and remote town within reach of river steamers. This, however, is a question to be decided on its merits. The convention may be expected to be on its guard in relation to giving endorsement to doubtful projects, and to work harmoniously for the promotion of the main purpose in view.

An Able Argument The argument recently delivered by by D. M. Delmas before Judge Buck, of
D. M. Delmas. the Superior Court of San Mateo County, in relation to the Lux estate, was one of the ablest efforts of that distinguished lawyer.
It has excited much admiring comment among attorneys, and it would be difficult to find anything more comprehensive and incisive in the way of a legal analysis of evidence. It was eloquent from beginning to end, and yet wholly practical and business-like in dealing with a succession of business propositions. Even dry matters of account, in the hands of this gifted advocate, become full of interest, and columns of figures seem animate with life. Severe as this brilliant forensic effort was in its arraignment of the opposing parties, it was throughout marked by the perfection of courtesy. Even to the objects of the eminent counsel's attack this studious urbanity was displayed. While blows were given with telling force they were at all times delivered in the manner of one who would rather compliment than denounce. To the opposing counsel, especially, Mr. Delmas was more than polite. He handsomely complimented the argument of Mr. McInerney, to which his own vigorous effort was a strong reply, and certainly the elder barrister lost nothing by thus praising the ability of his adversary. In this regard Mr. Delmas sets to the bar of this city and of the State an example worthy of imitation. Occupying the first place as an advocate, he can afford to be generous, and assuredly he is more than kind to his legal brethren. This characteristic amiability is the more remarkable from its dwelling in a legal mind of the most penetrating and logical cast. So completely master of himself is this accomplished jurist that he serenely smiles even when applying the lash of his merciless satire to the objects of his attack. His late argument illustrated the fact that the greatest strength of intellect is never more strikingly displayed than when, under the strain of an important contest at the bar, an eloquent pleader is master of himself as well as of his cause, using a copious vocabulary and rare powers of invective with a moderation and a tact that constantly hint of abundant forces in reserve. Contrast this style of argumentation with that of some of the blustering blatherskites of the San Francisco bar, and what a gulf appears between them! The younger generation of advocates, who have the sagacity to take Mr. Delmas as a model of forensic grace and skill, will at least win credit for good taste, though few of them may aspire to reach the enviable position he has gained.

War Some of the peculiarities of the Jingo are that he
Talk. thinks he is the only patriotic American alive; that he always carries a chip on his shoulder; that he is always ready to have his country go to war to retrieve a fancied disgrace, and to let other people do the fighting for him and his beloved country. He is found chiefly among politicians who have not yet learned the alphabet of statesmanship, and among that class of the people who have neither houses nor lauds, nor bank accounts, nor much merchandise, nor bullion, nor gold, nor silver coin laid up for future needs. But behind these inordinately effulgent beings is the great body of thinking and responsible people, who do not follow the Jingo method of going off at half-cock, and who have a way of developing a sober second thought which, after all, is the only basis of rational and prudent conduct. Men of means and responsibility, people of observation and thought, who soon saw what war meant to America and all mankind were aghast at the flippant ease with which they were ready to involve the country into any kind of disaster. Though at first we heard of nothing but an apparent unanimity of feeling and will, yet there has now come a deep undertone of dissatisfaction and horror at the possibility of a war with England. It is not that there is wanting any broad and deep patriotism, nor any lack of sensitiveness upon any point of honor. There is a feeling of suspicion that the President might have formed his message in language a little more moderate, and a desire to be sure that the Monroe doctrine is necessarily threatened with violation, and a decent hope and belief that the matter of artitrotion might longer have been left open to argument, with the possibility that further discussion might eventuate in persuading England to accord with our suggestion. There is no wish on the part of anybody but Jingos to have war. There is no wish on the part of England to hasten it. The question is plainly not one of such gigantic importance that it may not yet be settled in a decent and peaceable manner, and no man hang his head for shame.

Comstock Mining Shares. The holiday season is not the time to look for much activity in the market for Comstock mining shares. While business has been dull lately, prices have, however, been well-sustained, and, at the close, a hardening tendency is noted for the middle shares, especially Occidental. Dealers should not overlook the Brunswick lode as a factor in the business from this time forth. The properties there which have been incorporated with older companies at the North End, may open up some day, and send shares booming when least expected. All that is needed to help the Comstock out is a head to manipulate the stocks as of old, and the ease of money, which is the chief and main auxiliary. Without the latter it is useless to expect much from brain power alone, which is all well enough to conceive, while helpless to execute unaided by the paltry pelf for which everybody is striving. The American Flat scheme seems to be dying a natural death. If one has to wait until the Sutro Tunnel paupers can revive it, the present generation will never reap any results from the enterprise. It would be worth somebody's while to advance the merits of this mining proposition a little.

Gold Mines Are now In Demand. For the first time in a very long time the new year opens up with a very bright prospect for mining in California. It is doubtful whether, since the days of the "rush" in 1849, the outlook has been more favorable than it is just now. And the best of it is there is no sentiment about the present movement, nor is there a feverish excitement about it upon which to predicate a "boom" or the undue inflation resulting from an era of reckless speculation which invariably reflects eventually such injury upon the community at large. The growing demand is now based upon the march of progressive improvement which, having developed other industries to a point from which at present there is no possible expansion, now returns to one field unlimited in its extent and possibilities, and which practically has never been more than scratched upon the surface. An idea suggested in some quarter that the probability of war with Great Britain would serve to check gold mining, is nothing more than an idea. If some of these alarmists could only protract their nervous, over-wrought existence in a sphere of vain imaginations, until the two great nations of the earth clash on the bloody field of battle, they would be as old as Methuselah. There was no necessity for the recent display of jingoism in high quarters at Washington, which led to the loss, within a few short days, of no less than $500,000,000 by people on both sides of the Atlantic. The mutual and combined interests of both countries are too heavy to permit either to cater to the whims of a set of politicians who talk for talk's sake. Why, even the Queen herself, although it may not be generally known, owns some of the finest and most profitable income paying property in New York, on Broadway from the Battery up to Canal street, showing as good a sense of business as a host of her subjects who are up to their ears in American investments. There is not much likelihood of these people bombarding their own property at the risk of millions for the sake of a miserable coyote hole in South America. There need be no distrust felt on this score in regard to any possible bearing on the mining interests.

Protection for Investors. The trend of public opinion in this city is evidenced by the activity recently developed among the mining men, and the means which are being taken to control the business so as to protect themselves and the public against the schemes of sharpers. The San Francisco Stock Exchange has not only voted to list all reputable gold mines free, but have gone even further, and forwarded circulars to the leading mine owners, asking for co-operation. The Gold Mining Exchange, another corporation, has also been organized, with a charter membership consisting of a number of the best known and most influential mining men in the State. This Exchange announces that, while not dealing exclusively, as its old established neighbor on Pine street, in stocks of the several companies, that it will labor in bringing the mine-owner and the capitalist together, for the purpose of engaging the necessary means to develop promising prospects. This will involve the employment of a corps of experts, whose business it will be to report on properties which, if approved, will be given a certificate to that effect, stamped with the seal of the Exchange. This will do away with the middle man, who, in the past, has lived upon plundering the public, by means of lying statements and misrepresentation. There should be no lack of money for investments in mining when the monied people are protected and ensured of a safe management of their property. Capital is over-plentiful in this city, and the amounts lying idle would, in the aggregate, figure up an enormous sum. To open up a channel where it can be employed to advantage, with a chance for a grand return upon the investment, is a work which cannot fail to meet with approbation in all quarters.

New York Stock Market. There has been less interest manifested in stocks during the past week. For several days the market has been left almost entirely in the hands of room traders. London bought back a considerable amount of the stock they recklessly sold less than a fortnight ago at quite an advance. Speculators sold out quite an amount of the long stock accumulated during the recent panic early in the week, but came back into the market as buyers again at a slight decline. Some of the better stocks are about back to their former prices and firmly held. Others have made rapid advances and are hard to secure in large amounts at current prices. Prices during the week have advanced 1½ to 3½ per cent. Earnings are entirely satisfactory, and promise to continue so. In the Industrial list there has been generally a steady market. Sugar has led the list in strength. Tobacco, Leather and Gas have ruled higher. The high rate of interest on loans has restricted speculation, and will probably be the factor in the market for some time to come.

An Old-time Fire Company. The eighty-sixth annual financial statement of the Hartford Fire Company, of Hartford, Connecticut, has been issued. The statement shows that this sturdy old pioneer of the fire insurance business has been renewing its youth as the years roll on, a credit to the institutions of this country, among which it ranks as a giant. With a gross annual income of $7,060,163, it now holds as a surplus to policy holders the magnificent sum of $4,150,893. During the year ended on January 1, 1896, the Hartford increased its assets $583,477.47, added $164,349.75 to its re-insurance reserve, and $400,546 to its net surplus. The total assets are now set down at $9,229,213.09, with a reserve for re-insurance of $4,404,238, a reserve for all unsettled claims of $674,081.08, and a net surplus over everything, including capital stock, of $2,900,893. The managers of the Pacific department of this substantial company, with head offices in this city, are Henry K. Belden, chief, and Whitney Palache, assistant.

Business Picking Up. The bank clearings for the year show a healthy gain over 1894 amounting to $692,079,240, as against $658,526,806 for the preceding year. This is satisfactory, and promises well for 1896. A large amount of money went into circulation during the past two days. In addition to the semi-annual interest of the savings banks and the payments on City, County, and State bonds, a large number of outside bonds and securities have just disbursed dividends. Among the local corporations may be mentioned the Capital Gas Company, of Sacramento, $1, and the Stockton Gas Light and Heat Company, 30 cents.

Annual Treasure Receipts. The receipts of treasure at this port per Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express during the twelve months ending December 31st, 1895, were as follows: From the interior, $21,725,878; from the north coast, $747,495; total, $22,473,373. The descriptions and amounts were as follows: Coin, $16,218,580; silver bullion, $2,601,987; gold bullion, $3,652,806. The inland shipments from San Francisco were $28,062,362, and the shipments overland were $500 in silver bullion, $35,138 in gold bullion, and $17,117,785 in coin.

a record which has been envied by old and noted members at the Bar. Born near Sacramento, not thirty years ago, he was graduated from the State University in 1891, and entered the well-known law office of Fox and Kellogg. In just a year he was able to pass a brilliant examination with admission to the Bar. Entering into partnership with Mr. F. R. King, he entered upon down-right hard work. In one of his first cases he made a record. It was that of Winterburn against the Directors of the People's Home Savings Bank, when he showed up so thoroughly the terrible frauds and wholesale conspiracy which had been systematically practiced against the depositors. His next exploit was the case of Baker against Bricknell, which is now before the Supreme Court of the United States. It involves a title to property in San Francisco involving half a million of dollars, and involves many claims of less magnitude. Mr. Shaw has recently entered into business for himself, for the firm of King & Shaw was dissolved by mutual consent last week. Henceforth Mr. Shaw will conduct his business in his own name, attending personally to his client's affairs with that scrupulous regard for their interests which hitherto won him no slight renown.

HARRY PIPER.

ALL the property-owners in San Francisco know genial Harry Piper, the chief assistant in the County Clerk's office. A native son, born in San Francisco thirty-two years ago, and educated in our public schools, he is a thorough Californian, as well as a perfect San Franciscan, in sentiment. A young man of the most rigid principles in regard to duty, the four years which he served in the Sheriff's office, under Charles Laumeister, made him a record to be envied; and it is not at all a matter of wonder that he should be asked to the present important position of civic trust which he now holds. During his career in the Sheriff's office he introduced many valuable reforms in the management of the county's affairs, which were greatly appreciated by Mr. Laumeister. So now, the administration of his office as Chief Deputy County Clerk, has had a highly beneficial effect in simplifying the office routine. A practical, level-headed business man, he has municipal affairs at his fingers' ends.

PAW TEMPLE'S NEW YEAR'S BATH

By Henry D. Bigelow

"That big can's going to be mince pie for maw," said Temple, gratefully; "Mis' Fred Liebig, she had that all fixed up for maw. You like mince pie? Well, you jes' see our New Years feed when maw takes hold. Have a pull on the other bottle? No? Say, I wasn't sinkin' that from you, boys; I only forgot about it."

And presently he was down the trail, confident of his poor, old, tired horse's footsteps.

ONCE upon a time, some dozen years ago, I spent a most extraordinary New Years in Sonoma County, just on the edge of Mendocino's boundary—up toward Crane's Peak. It was very clear and frosty weather, just following a storm that had wrecked two of the biggest redwoods near our cabin, and compelled Billy Ham and myself to go out looking for ninety and nine sheep which had gone astray. Poor things! We were bad managers, and lots of tiny lambs which should have been babies later on were lying dead on the frosty hill-side. We were very blue over the prospect ourselves, and went back to the cabin to warm up on hot coffee.

There we found old man Temple, an ancient Missouri resident—our nearest neighbor, and six miles away—drinking with both hands around the coffee pot; gulping and gasping at every swallow. Temple was six feet one, sixty years old, with a paunch upon him that would have put Sancho Panza to the blush. I believe his constitution might always have been described as anemic.

"Whar you b'en?" was his genial salutation, as he replaced the coffee pot on the glowing embers of the chimney fire—(we had no stove). "I come in here cold, an' I jes thought I'd warm up some." Then he carefully stroked his only adornment—a straggly chin whisker; that's all one could call it.

His eyes were as bleary as those of his gaunt, steaming broncho tied to the moss covered rail of the corral. Smoke arose from the nostrils of the unfortunate animal as it tried to drag itself and the fence into the warmth of the rising sun.

"Have some!" exclaimed Temple, offering a black bottle.

There was only a half inch in the bottom—but we knew better than to put our tongues to it, for it was old man Temple's habit to drink pure alcohol, in accordance with the "excess of excess" which has been the curse of many a rancher in the hills.

"Say, I b'en down to Fiske's Mills, along with old man McAppin, an' I sort of lost him, round by old Hauser's bridge. Have a drink."

It was for us an amusing situation. But we urged him to pour the "wee drap" in his bottle down his own gullet, on top of the coffee. He did so, and never winced.

"To-morrow's New Years," he observed, as Billy and I began to shake up the fire, and cook our breakfast.

"Yes," I replied, "and I hope you'll have a good time."

"Well, I bet!" he answered, "an' I want you boys to come over to the ranch an' enjoy things. Maw's going to get up more'n we can eat, if we eat all day. She's going to have cracklins, an' corn-pones, an' fried chicken!"

Now this was very alluring, for old "Maw" Temple could cook in the sanctified Southern style, and almost to perfection.

"We got some young deer meat, too," added Temple casually.

This decided it at once. We gave the old fellow a breakfast, his horse a bite from our meagre store of barley, and promised to be at his New Years dinner next afternoon. Then we solemnly and courteously aided him to mount his jaded steed and steered him toward the Walhalla trail. As he departed, his saddle-bag—a rough potato sack—dropped off into a bunch of wild rose bush next the hogpen, and a full bottle of more alcohol fell out of its mouth, also, a big, fat can.

We hastened to replace his stores, tying them safely by the saddle leathers.

We—that is, my partner Billy Ham and myself—abandoned our high mountain fastness, about noon, New Years Day, and left sheep, cows, pigs, and horses with the warm sunshine. In a crow's flight it would be a quick jump to Temple's ranch. In fact, one could shout across the canyon when he was out on the range, and after awhile hear his shrill, falsetto answer.

Taking a precipitous trail, we stumbled down the rocky descent, among the redwoods, across the creek, and upward through the brush till we reached the slippery, wet grass of last year on the western hillside. A "gullied" wood road was next in order, and after that one could turn and look toward the splendid blue wall of the Pacific Ocean, which rose up many miles away to welcome the New Year and to worship the sun.

"Mr. Temple, Esquire" (as he used to straggle his signature) was possessed of a rambling domicile, which had stretched from a log cabin, during his long occupancy, into a respectable habitation, for those regions. The main part was ten logs high, and all sorts of additions had been made by the aid of shakes and rough boards.

The two acre orchard was grunting with hogs, hard at work on the remnants of the winter apples.

Two ragged, pretty children came down to the gate, just below the house. They were twins, and were grandchildren of the Temples. When their immediate parentage had ever disappeared, no one seemed to know in this lonely district, but for the past seven years "old man Temple" and his wife had housed, fed, and half-clothed the little daughters of his wayward child and her deceiver.

"I think they's somewhar's in Arizona," he would say; "but you kain't tell gen'elly. Loretta, she was good; but that nigger singer came along when she was down to school in Santa Rosa, an' first we know they sent me au' maw the twins."

The twins were white-headed little seven-year old rascals. Their thin calico gowns were sufficient in the noon-day—for now the sun was warm; but their bare feet seemed painfully sensitive. Both were out of breath.

"Say!" they cried, both at a time, "Nelly au' Minty's run off with the well, an' grau'paw—he's awful mad! Gran'maw's got him to bed quick!"

This would be an enigma to the uninitiated; but "Nellie" and "Minty" were two razor-backed mules which formed a portion of Temple's personal estate. How they could have run away with the family well was a problem so extraordinary that we patted the excited little girls on the head, and gave them a lot of picture papers for a Christmas present—all we could do!—and then strode up the path to the lengthy cabin.

There was poor old Mrs. Temple—a tiny, silver-locked creature, with a wizened face. "Wizened" is no word for it! Every county on the map of Texas was expressed in the tangled wrinkles of her sixty years.

"Happy New Year!" exclaimed Billy and I in unison, as we swung the merry twins on to the steps.

Mrs. Temple wrung her hands in grief.

"Paw's mos' gone crazy!" she wailed.

"What's the matter?"

"Oh, he come home 'bout sun up, an' he fed that Betty mare a shift of mince pie meat Mis' Liebig sent up from round Timber Cove. We don't get no pies this time. Then he went and spoiled all the well, an' he says 'I'm blamed!'"

Here was another "well" mystery. First the mules, and now ol' "grandmaw" Temple!

"They clean ran off with it, honey," she moaned, wiping her faded, tattered eyes, which were pink and avascular with capillaries and age.

"With what?" Billy Ham exclaimed.

"Oh, the hell thing, it's all clean gone to hell, an' the mules is gone, an' the well, and Richard Henry Temple is a damaged man, but he ain't frozen to death by that well, but he's jes gettin' warmed up, an' he's mad like fury! Them mules jumped off with the bucket an' all the well, an' I couldn't do nothin' else but save him out, an' now he says I'm blamed!"

"Richard Henry Temple, he come home this mornin'," continued the poor "grandmaw," weeping, "an' he says he was hot. I was mad, coz' he'd been down to the coast. He says 'I'm thirsty, an' I'm gom' to have water this time."

"I thought it warn't good, considerin' his breath, an' he went out looking for that cussed ol' well. He got mad when the rope wouldn't work, and that's when it happened!"

Now, it may be parenthetically explained that the Temple Ranch was so situated that, owing to the rocky nature of the country, the proprietor had been compelled to dig a forty-foot well just behind his rough and tumble kitchen. Contrary to precedent in such cases, his windlass supported but a single bucket, which had once been a small pickle keg. To bring up this bucket full of icy water, one would have to turn a most unwieldy crank, half wood, the handle iron.

"Paw," says I," continued Mrs. Temple, "'ain't you better go rest? The twins'll see you 'juss' like you air now. You don't want nothin' more for drink.'"

"I'm parched," he says, "an' I'm goin' for cold water," an' then off th' damn ol' fool goes to th' well rail, an' was mad 'coz the bucket was all empty. He was tryin' to pull on the rope, so's to send it down. First thing I see—Paw goes with it! Forty foot down, in four foot of ice water!"

"Is he dead?" we both cried with alarm, for, with all the old man's faults we loved his New Years dinner still.

"Paw?—he's all right; it's the well-gear! He's makin' terrible trouble!" You ain't got no sense, child! Why, paw went down that thar well, an' he stood in all that water, four feet deep, an' he hollers up to me, 'maw, wind up the rope!'"

[Another break in the narrative. Mrs. Temple had been worn out by the desperation which a rancher's wife too often reaches.]

"I jes' tried an' tried to wind up that ol' crank, an' the twins they had a hold of me. We was afraid he'd get froze besides drowned. We got him half up twice, and then that thar old crank went back on us' and the kids. It just sent Fan one way an' Kit the next. I held ou, an' went last, an' paw he yells up when he drops splash back again in that thar' well: 'Maw, maw! What in hell you doin' to me! Ain't I be'u a kind paw, an' ain't I he'n indulgent gran'paw!'"

"Why, say!" continued the tearful old lady, "I'd let him drop twenty feet!"—down in that thar water again! Jus' think! Why, I was crazy!

"Paw!" I called down after the splash stopped—"paw, I'll get you up! Just you wait!—an' I went off to the corral, an' I got "Nellie" an' "Minty," our two mules. Say! they cost money!—an' I harnessed them up, an' I put an ol' ox-chain on top of the well-gear an' then I started off pulling on their bits. When we got to th' fence I whacked hard, right on top of them, an', if you could have seen that "Nellie" mule an' that "Minty" mule start across through the fences an' across th' field, you'd think they was racing. But the well rope went along, an' Richard Henry Temple he come up so quick he never was able to pick himself out of the ol' bucket till it got to the fence."

"Gran'paw!" says I, when I was easin' him off th' field to get home, 'gran'paw, you're most dead!' "Why, he was all of a shaky shivering!"

"Then them ol' mules they kep' on going, au' gran'paw he seen the well works and the ox-chain after 'em down the gulch."

"Susan Temple!" says he, 'you are a damn old fool!'"

"But," says I, 'you'd have froze to death!'"

"You broke th' well!" he says; 'an' first you tried to drown me, an' then you dumped me in th' hog trough, an' we married forty years!"

"You broke th' well," says he, an' them mules has gone off with it to Jericho and two hundred and fifty dollars!"

"Then gran'paw, he had a chill, an' I kep' tryin' to still him. He's back inside, in bed, I'm gettin' him warmed up."

"Warned up!" exclaimed Billy Ham, "'Is your Kettle on the fire? It is! Give me a cop and some sugar. Ah! here we are steaming hot!"

"And with that he entered the bedroom gingerly. Touching ol' Temple on the brow, he said gently:

"Here, gran'paw, this is only hot gin, and it will do you good."

The patient rose as if from a trance, and gulped the scalding water down as if it were his favorite alcohol.

"The best old gin I ever struck," he observed as he smacked his lips. "Come, let's go find the mules."

The mules were only just across the field, in the brush. The well rope and its gearing were too obstinate, and had tangled them up till they couldn't kick. Meanwhile, "Gran'maw" Temple prepared her "corn ponies" and her "fried chicken," so that we had New Year's dinner all the same.

Yet all the while the ungrateful old Temple would murmur sullenly:

"You busted the well au' you most lost the mules!"

As for Kit and Fan, the poor little twins, we told them stories of "Cinderella" and "Red Riding Hood" till their curly heads nodded; then we climbed down toward home.

THE YEAR AT THE THEATRES

BY ASHTON P. STEVENS.

CAN it be that the change of a number in the figures that mark the year plays any vital part in the destiny of man? Yet it is at this annual adding of one that one's retrospection of the preceding twelve months is keenest, one's contrition deepest, while at the same time the roses of optimism never bloom fairer than in the biting air of the new January. As I write the epitaph of the year theatrical 1895 my brutal candor is assuaged only by a natural revulsion for adding to the damnation of the dead, and the gleeful and hilarious, although entirely unfounded, hopefulness that each year I find in contemplation of the quick. So far as the drama is concerned—or what part of it dribbled its way into San Francisco during the twelve months of the late lamented's existence—I am glad that the embalmers art is not mine. A noiseless interment, or the consuming scorch of the crematory, is better fitted to the final rites of this eventless step toward a new century. Looking backward at a year of lusterless stars, threadbare plays and the worse than usual procession of mediocrity relieved at long intervals by some stray flash of originality in play making, or an actor awakened to the meaning of his art, does not add to the beatification of that process of mental indigestion known as memory. To my thinking, a man's mind is but an imperfect thing until it can be adjusted to forget all happenings unworthy of a niche in our mental store-houses.

The Baldwin Theatre opened the season of 1895 with the Tavery Opera Company. My strongest recollection of this organization is of a trio in which the contralto panted in fiery Italian, the tenor wheezed the ghost of a once great voice in French and the barytone expectorated in German. They were only three, but never since the fall of Babylon has such soul-stirring polyglot been voiced.

Ward and James followed the Tavery Company in a brave revival of the legitimate. Mr. James, I remember, had to act with one eye; nevertheless it was a wholesome feast of the ever palatable, characterized by the excellent mountings, and stage direction that are conspicuous wherever the hand of Warde is guiding. They went to the California later and played Ranunculus. Whatever be the merits or de-merits of Ranunculus, no play of modern times has evoked such thunder in its fall. It is echoing yet.

A Gaiety Girl came, and although its fun was vague, the music was the cleverest of its class that has been heard here.

Marie Burroughs' endeavor at Juliet was the next event of interest. This was before Mrs. Pat Campbell's end of the century version had taught London what a high-bred, discreet little maiden Juliet really was, or perhaps Miss Burroughs would not have gasped so violently, nor loved so hard.

Dropping a tear for pretty little Dorothy Morton and The Facing Master, I skip a series of blank weeks and recall the formal opening of the Columbia Theatre by the Frawley Company. A modest little band of players they, and arriving propitiously when the principal opposition houses had closed their doors, soon won a favorite place in the public's esteem. To be sure Mr. Frawley's habitual casting of himself in the leading roles grew wearisome; however, the plays were well chosen and comparatively unhackneyed, and the company for the most part painstaking and efficient.

The Baldwin re-opened with the Lyceum Theatre Company in The Case of Rebellious Susan, a problem comedy admirably acted, but not refreshing. The Amazons was real comedy; light even to evanescence, and clean and dainty in every one of its fanciful lines. The night most luminous in my recollection of the year is that on which the curtain rose on An Ideal Husband. Wilde's amazing dexterity with words, his drastic epigrams, each a cameo of purest English, and his superb construction, where every line and incident fell with the nicety of crystallization left an impression that will not soon be effaced.

A Company headed by Rose Coghlan, Henry E. Dixey and Maurice Barrymore succeeded the Frawley Company at the Columbia in August. Twelfth Night was the opening piece, and for the lack of adequate stage direction, it was a wretched performance despite the good people in the cast. A Woman of No Importance, given later by the same players, introduced another inimitable society drama by Wilde and afforded some skillful acting for Miss Coghlan and Mr. Barrymore.

John Drew and Maud Adams came to the Baldwin at about this time, presenting a new play by Henry Arthur Jones, The Bubble Shop. Mr. Drew's surprising ability for a serious part and the dramatic strength of the second act compelled an interest in a play, which, taken as a whole, is not up to Jones' standard. Besides the repertory of his preceding season, Drew honored us with the premiere of Carleton's now defunct That Imprudent Young Couple; a play, I believe, killed by the countless lines in pitiable attempt at epigram that a character named Goltry ground out with a dismal deliberation that delayed the final curtain until 11:30. It is becoming a habit among the gentlemen of the dramatic columns of the Eastern press to single out John Drew as the most harrowing example of the degenerating actor; a custom attributable more to his ill fortune in choosing a new play than any decline in his artistic work. John Drew, in his own cheery sphere, is peerless, and in Maud Adams he has a companion player that it would be impossible to replace.

Preceded by an inflated newspaper reputation, Pauline Hall paid her long promised visit to San Francisco, bringing with her that most stupid of musical comedies, Dorcas, in which she evidenced no singing ability and not much more skill as an actress.

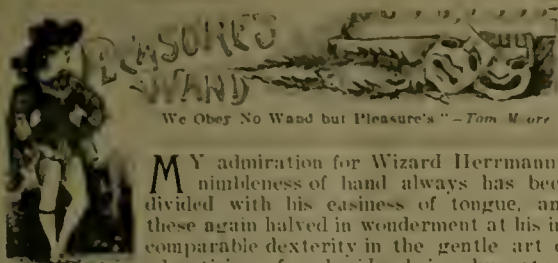

Trilby stands out in bold relief as the popular success of the season. Potter's play was powerful, and the startling possibilities of the character Svengali—this slimy, snake-like man whose transcendent genius shone above all his repulsive villainy—were developed with masterly art by Wilton Lackaye.

The Bostonians enjoyed a luxurious season of five weeks at the Columbia, giving us, besides that immortal composite Robin Hood, two new operas; one of which (A War Time Wedding) made a distinctive success.

Unlike Pauline Hall's, De Wolf Hopper's visit showed a justification for the highest praises that have been sung of him. Wang and Dr. Syntax were in themselves nothing remarkable, but Hopper's unusual methods and the paradox of a singing comedian with a voice gave him instantaneous recognition.

Helena, a sterling play of Sardou's, new to us, but by no means an infant, was the feature of Robert Downing's recent engagement at the California. 1892 at the Baldwin and rollicking, rotund May Irwin in The Widow Jones at the California practically closes our year of the play.

In addition to the productions enumerated, we have seen three of the 365 works annually penned by the indefatigable Mr. Hoyt, two score of grand, comic and spectacular operas at the Tivoli, 1800 homicides at the Grand, all sorts and conditions of plays at the Alcazar and I don't know how many exhilarating specialties at the Orpheum. But for even, unmolested infecundity San Francisco's dramatic year 1895 takes the palm.

We Obey No Wand but Pleasure's - Tom Moore

MY admiration for Wizard Herrmann's nimbleness of hand always has been divided with his easiness of tongue, and these again halved in wonderment at his incomparable dexterity in the gentle art of advertising, for, besides being by nature gifted with a most thrilling likeness of what we imagine is the physical aspect of the great father of black art. His Satanic Serenity, M. Herrmann is one of the greatest showmen of our times. None know better than he how to imbue their personality in the public mind, and few relaxations are healthier or more amusing than an evening with this mystifying gentleman. Herrmann's return week at the Baldwin is the first strain that San Francisco can remember on his popularity. His bullet-catching feat is a marvelous deception, and, up to the present writing, has defied satisfactory explanation, but the balance of the performance, given a few weeks previous at the California, is too fresh in the memory of theatre-goers to have warranted so early a repetition. Madame Herrmann's dances, which, like good pictures, seem to improve on acquaintance, and the bullet trick have been the bright spots in this week's entertainment.

Louis James, always a favorite here, comes to the California Monday evening, supported by an excellent company. Besides Virginus, Macbeth, and Othello, in each of which roles he has enviable fame, Mr. James will give us Marmion, an adaptation of Scott's poem, and his interpretation of Hamlet, said to be a radical and interesting portrayal of the Dane. The first week's repertory is: Monday, Tuesday, and Sunday nights and Saturday matinee, Virginus; Wednesday and Thursday, Hamlet; Friday and Saturday, Macbeth.

Monday evening at the Tivoli will be presented a second edition of the successful mythological burlesque, Leion, in which new songs, dances and specialties will be introduced. Little Gertie Carlisle and little Pearl Landers will each have a taking specialty, while Hartman, Leary, Rafael, Pache, and Misses Millard, Carle, Baker and Stockmeyer will introduce new songs, duets and trios. The sale of seats is so large that it looks as if Leion will have one of the greatest runs ever known at this house.

The Runaway Wife adds another to the long list of successes at the Grand. Next week Tom Craven's famous comedy drama, The Fugitive, will be given. The play teems with exciting incidents, relieved by timely touches of comedy, and offers admirable roles for the Messrs. Brinker, Bulter, Swain and Lothian, and the Misses Hall and Thropp.

The Orpheum continues to maintain its reputation as one of America's greatest music halls. Manager Walter's indefatigable search for the cream of specialties makes of every performance a unique vandyville event. The holiday season has turned hundreds away from the doors.

The members of the Frawley Company will, no doubt, be given a rousing New Year's greeting on Monday evening, when De Mille's powerful drama, The Lost Paradise, is to be presented by that popular organization. The Frawley company, besides the cleverness of its players, made patent by last season's successful engagement, comes equipped with some excellent new plays, which are to be mounted in a lavish manner.

Leonard Grover's perennial farce, Our Boarding House, has been attesting its ever-mirthfulness at the Alcazar, this week, to a good business. Monday night will see the first presentation of a successful French farce-comedy, My Precious Baby, in which the entire strength of the company will be demonstrated, augmented by two important new engagements, that of Miss Nina Gleason and Miss Camille Cleveland.

Marie Wainwright and a strong company, headed by Nathaniel Harting, open at the Baldwin Monday night, in The Daughters of Eve, a new society drama by A. E. Lancaster and Julian Magnus. The play has been well received in the East, and will run throughout the opening week. During the week following Miss Wainwright will give The Love Chase, An Unequal Match, As You Like It, and Camille.

The Tuesday and Friday mornings for ladies, at the Lurline Baths, continue to be extremely popular. Large parties of ladies go regularly on these mornings to enjoy the exclusive swim afforded them. They being centrally located, and having the tank refilled each day with the pure ocean salt water, make them the favored baths of San Francisco. The emptying of the tank every night at 10:30 o'clock is free to public view.

THE YEAR IN SOCIETY.

AT the close of a year it is a good thing that a look backwards be taken to ascertain what has been accomplished in the months that have taken their flight into the chambers of the past. It may prove interesting, therefore, to take a retrospective glance over what has confessedly been the gayest year that society in San Francisco has known in a decade; but the entertainments of the swim have been so many and so varied in character it would be quite impossible in the limits of this article to enumerate them all, so the chief events of each month will merely be touched upon, commencing with the holiday week of 1894. That it was a brilliant one will readily be admitted, including as it did the début hall of Miss Alice Hager at Armory Hall; the cotillion of the Friday Night Club; the assembly at Golden Gate Hall, and the New Year Eve dance of the Monday Night Club at Lunt's Hall. Society betook itself in large numbers to Del Monte for the New Year festivities, and during the first week in January the Terpsichoreans gave their first dance at Miss West's school, Ed. Greenway leading the cotillion. Theatre parties were quite a fad during the month, especially to hear Scheel's orchestra at the Auditorium, and were as a rule followed by suppers. Mesdames Martin and Donahue took the lead among the elaborate dinner givers of society, and the tea hostesses included Miss Clarice Sheldon, Misses Helen Woolworth, Ella Morgan, and Clem. Kip; Mesdames Van Ness, H. M. A. Miller, Horace Hill, J. F. Swift, Thomas Breeze, McKenna, Henry Van Wyck, J. L. Rathbone, and Jos. Crockett; at the latter Miss Ella Hobart's engagement to Winthrop Lester being announced.

Among the ball givers were Mrs. Thomas and Mrs. Bachman, and Cutler Paige gave a cotillion preceded by a theatre party and followed by supper. Several hops took place at the Presidio, the disappointment of the month being the postponement of the reception on board the flagship Philadelphia, that vessel being unexpectedly ordered to Honolulu.

February's chief event was the hall given by Mr. and Mrs. Dan Murphy in the Maple Hall of the Palace on the evening of the 8th, and a pleasing novelty was the charade party got up by Miss Minnie Houghton, another one on the same lines being given by Mrs. Joe Tobin the following week, and Mrs. De Young inaugurated her pretty theatre with private theatricals. The Vaudeville Club had a meeting at Mrs. Henry Scott's on the evening of the 20th, at which the "German supper" was the chief feature. The Cotillion Club, the Friday Night Club, and the Entre Nous Club gave their usual dances, and the Monday evening Club gave a Mardi Gras assembly. Teas were in great form during February, as many as three and four being given on some days by both maids and matrons. Some of the ladies also gave luncheon parties at the University Club, and Miss Emma Butler gave one to the buds at the Hotel Richelieu. The pink and white wedding of Miss Clarice Sheldon and Cutler Paige was solemnized at St. Luke's Church on the 14th (St. Valentine's day). Miss Mary Bourne and James Tucker were wedded at the Bourne residence on Broadway; and Miss Josephine Welsh and Dr. Stanley Stillman at St. Mary's Cathedral on Shrove Tuesday, afternoon and evening, while the wedding engagements announced included those of Miss Alice Simpkins and Robert Coleman, Miss Alice Hager and Alfred Tubbs. The production, on the 18th, of Runnymede at the California Theatre, was the motif for numerous theatre parties as well as to see the "Gaiety girls" at the Baldwin.

Lent being upon the carpet during the month of March, society did not indulge in anything very pronounced. Theatre parties, card parties, recitation and musical gatherings were plentiful, however. Miss Daisy Van Ness gave the first bicycle party of the season, followed by supper at the University Club, and Mrs. Wakefield Baker gave another. Among the dinner givers were Mrs. Gordon Blanding, Mrs. Louis Auzeais, Mesdames Martin and Donahue, and teas were given by Mrs. J. H. Jewett, Mrs. Ashton, and at the Hopkins' Art Institute. The largest gathering of the month was the "Trilhy" party at the San Francisco Ver-ein Club, which was a novelty; and Mrs. David Bixler's mi-careme dinner and musicale; the Dutch tea of the Channing Auxiliary was a pleasant affair, closing the month charmingly.

The first sensation of April was the polo tournament at Burlingame between the club members and the army officers from Walla Walla, resulting in the victory of the club, and entertaining was extensively done in honor of the visiting strangers from the north and the south. The weddings of the month were those of Miss Lillian Miles and Lieutenant Kilbourne on Easter Monday, the 15th. Miss Alice Decker and Elliott McAllister, at Grace Church on the 16th; Miss Elsie Knox and Ed. Jennings on the 17th; Miss Eva Carolan and W. E. Timlow at St. Luke's Church on the 23d; Miss Alice Simpkins and Robert Coleman at Trinity on the 24th; Miss Francis Wordnell and Fred Lemon at A. L. Bacroff's residence on the 29th. The last dance of the Assembly Club took place at Golden Gate Hall on the 25th; the Entre Nous closed their season with a dance on the 26th, and Mrs. Louis Auzeais' private theatrical party at the Palace Hotel, when Love on Crutches was performed, was the final event of the month on the 30th. The engagements of Miss Agnes Howard and Duncan Hayne; Miss Leua Lux and George McBride; Miss Mary Randol and Dr. Ed. Bunnell were announced.

The novelty of May was the open-air wedding celebration of Mrs. Elizabeth Ryer and Charles F. Joy at San Mateo on the 11th. Charity affairs included the steeple chase ridden by gentlemen in aid of the Little Jim Fund; an amateur theatrical performance at the California, when the Artist's Dream was produced for the benefit of the Ladies' Protection and Relief Society; the performance of the Yellow Curtain by the Auzeais amateurs; and the Romeo and Juliet burlesque by the Oakland amateurs at the Baldwin in aid of the Children's Hospital. The last hop at the Presidio took place on the 7th, and of the dancing club on the 10th. The engagement of Miss Alice McCutcheon and Ed. Schmiedell was announced at the first Simpson-Coleman reception, and of Miss May Holbrook and Sam Knight at an elaborate dinner given by Mrs. Holbrook for that purpose.

Society, which had already begun to leave town during the latter half of May, departed in large numbers early in June—Castle Crags, San Rafael and Del Monte were the resorts most sought, and at Burlingame there was a constant round of dinners, luncheons, polo, golf, tennis, coaching, excursions, picnics, etc. As a consequence life in the city became very dull. Weddings were the chief dissipation, and of these the most notable ceremonies were Miss Alice Tripler and Lieutenant Burtch at St. Luke's church on the 5th; Miss Alice Scott and James Brown at Grace Church on the 12th; Miss Alice Ziska and C. M. Jennings, a home wedding, on the 22d. The engagement of the month was Miss Mary Breeze and Lieutenant Benson, U. S. A.

Theatre parties were the rule in July. Donald DeV. Graham gave a studio tea, and the marriage of Miss Belle McPherson to Lieutenant McCracken was solemnized on the 24th.

The chief event in August was the Venetian spectacle at Belvedere on the 3d. Miss Nellie Jolliffe's marriage to Rudolph Spreckels on the 5th came as a sort of a surprise.

Country Club entertained Mrs. R. L. Stevenson at a reception in her honor. Mrs. Bliss gave a barn party at Redwood. Miss Agnes Howard and Duncan Hayne were married at San Mateo on the 10th, and the military encampment at Del Monte made that charming watering place very gay. The last week of August was devoted to Del Monte, where polo, the races, and the "shoot" were the attractions.

Society commenced to flock back to the city in September, and weddings were the first items of interest on the programme. Miss Ermentine Poole and Louis H. Long were wedded at the Burns' residence on the 4th; Ella Wheaton and the Rev. W. A. Brewer at St. Luke's on the 11th; Florence Weihe and B. W. Stone at St. Luke's on the 12th; the marriage of Miss Ella Hobart and Winthrop Lester was celebrated in grand style at the Hobart residence on the evening of the 10th. A great event of the month was the reception on board the flagship Philadelphia on the 18th, which was a handsome affair. Dinners and luncheons were again in order, and two dances were given, one by Mrs. L. L. Baker, and a cotillion by Miss Theresa Morgan, which Ed. Greenway led with the young hostess.

October promised earlier in the season to be a month of weddings, but a number of them did not take place until later in the year. The chief events in that line were the ceremonies which united Miss Florence Herrick and Mark Requa in Oakland, on the 2d; Miss Mamie Holbrook and Sam Knight at Dr. McKenzie's Church on the evening of the 8th; Miss Alice McCutcheon and Ed. Schmiedell at Grace Church at noon on the 16th, and the red wedding of Mrs. Clara Catherwood and Major Darling, at the lady's residence, on the 22d. Theatre parties, especially for Trilby, were the fad the earlier part of the month. Miss Cora Smedburg opened the tea season on the 1st, a number of others following soon after, and Miss Emma Butler gave the first luncheon party; the other events of the month included Lieutenant Potter's tug party, matronized by Mrs. Blunt of the Presidio; the first dance of the Saturday Night Club at Lunt's Hall on the 12th; the Woman's Exchange ball at Pioneer Hall on the 31st, and the Halloween party at Fort Mason; Shafter Howard's engagement to Miss Mollie Hunter, of Newport, R. I., was announced, as well as of Miss Bessie Younger and Burns McDonald.

The month of November was opened by the Entre Nous Club, which gave a dance at Maple Hall on the 1st. Teas, dinners, theatre parties, chate parties, etc., kept society busy while not occupied with the larger affairs, which included the wedding of Miss Julia Connor and Robert Bennett at Trinity Church on the 6th; the travesty on the "Babes in the Wood" at the San Francisco Verein Club on the 16th; the Friday Fortnightly and Monday Evening Club's dances; the Crocker cotillion on the 19th; the charity concerts at the Pavilion on the 19th and 20th; Miss Romie Wallace's debut ball at Armory Hall on the 21st; the Dickinson bal poudré at the Occidental on the 26th; the Polyclinic fête, and the Breeze-Benson nuptials at Grace Church on the 27th; the charity foot-ball game on the 28th, and the first dance of the Friday Night Cotillion Club at Odd Fellows' Hall on the 29th. The surprise of the month was the marriage of Miss Marie Baird and young Barry Baldwin. Miss Ella Goad's engagement to Osgood Hooker was announced.

The second annual Horse Show occupied the swim almost to the exclusion of everything else the first week in December, opening at the Pavilion on the 2d. Other events were theatre parties, the dance of the Entre Nous Club, Fred Magee's tug party, teas without end, Miss Alice Masten making her debut at one given by her sisters, and Miss Alice Boggs at one at her mother's house; the charity bazar, and several hops at the Presidio, the Sorosis Club reception in their new rooms on the 9th; Miss Hobart's dancing party and the Friday Fortnightly Club meeting on the 13th; the dance of the Monday Night Club on the 16th, Charley Baldwin's hunt ball at the Palace on the 17th, the Christmas cotillion of the Friday Night Club on the 20th. While December has not been so full of festivity as was November, there was enough going on to keep society well occupied. Dinners, of course, have been a feature of the holiday week, and the year 1895 may well be said to have been one of the pleasantest and gayest society has had for a long period of time.

THE sprite of the New Year sat on his throne,
The hall from roof to portals
Was filled with gifts to be bestowed
On various favored mortals.

So many, and so rich were they,
The good sprite felt uneasy
About his choice. "I'll do my best,
Dear friends," he said, "to please ye."

He called on his attendant imps,
And said: "Proceed to gift on
This mingled mass to find a sift
To hand to Talbot Clifton.

"What have you got? Some cobbler's wax?
"To cease this hiddle-faddle?"
"Yes, Sire, 'tis just what Talbot needs
"To keep him on his saddle."

"Not bad," the sprite approving said,
"You've done well, for a starter;
"What next? What is that ribbon thing?"
"The Order of the Garter.

"'Tis for Jack Parrott's leg; 't will fit
"Alone his golfing stockings,
"A loyal Britisher's best prize—"
"Well, what is that you're rocking?"

"A cradle, Sire, the girls say
"Hobart so long has tarried
"To take a wife, this gift may lure
"That young man to get married."

"Bring forth that doll—the Prince of Wales,
"A robe and crown installed in,
"And ship him, 'this side up with care,'
"To his friend, Charley Baldwin."

"Those two stuffed clubs—for whom are they?
"Their odor is not pleasant."
"They are for Polk and Wilson, Sire,
"A welcome New Year's present."

"Eight cloven feet, eight forked tails,
"Eight crimson-tinted visors,
"Eight patent sacks with patent casks,
"These send the Supervisors."

"Be careful with that dynamite,"
He cries, as one imp seizes
The deadly pack—" 'Tis Sistro's gift
To blow his casts to pieces.

"Apollo, and the posing nymphs,
"Those fake and vile creations,
"This useful agent will destroy
"Our Mayor's abominations.

"Those massive plates of solid steel,
"Shaped like a big square platter,
"Ship off to rich men to write wills,
"The lawyers cannot shatter.

"This tangled thing, it is a clue
"We'll warrant not defective,
"See that 'tis placed within the hands
"Of Lees, and the detectives.

"Behold this pit, all fenced around "With froth and airy bubble,
"We'll pass it to our warring friends,
"Pere York and Pastor Hubbell."

This giddy, gaudy skipping Jack,
So frisky, frotsky, frousky
We'll send with our best compliments
To Princey Poniatowski.

This cold deck's for the Union Club,
And don't omit the Joker,
The man who gets this patent pack
Will never lose at poker.

That all kind fellows, good and true,
May see the times grow better,
Receive our compliments to you
With this New Year's NEWS LETTER.

There is a new game of billiards played in town just now at the clubs. It is a combination of English billiards and pool. But George Nagle and Warren Payne, of Bohemian Club fame, have been attempting it. One is put under a certain handicap first—say 200 or 300 points to make. Then you must make a certain score before you can begin to count. It's one of the most demoralizing and perplexing diversions for the new comer that one could find if he were looking for it.

However, Mr. Payne met a delightful friend in the Occidental Hotel last week, who introduced to him a fellow Spanish-American. This latter plays the trombone in our best theatres and concerts; but he is a small creature, with a peppery disposition. In fact, he struts like a bantam. Payne mistook him for an Italian Count, and presently began to forget the musician was only "Professor." Half an hour afterwards the "Count" was introduced to distinguished company, and was dining sumptuously in the warm club dining room. He was as puzzled as "Christopher Sly" over the contresens, but Mr. Payne and Mr. Nagle, they say, would listen to no explanation. They were sure they had known him forever. He had diamonds in his shirt-front and wore a huge emerald ring.

Would he learn the new game of billiards?

Why, certainly—for always the politeness sake!—after such a beautiful dinner!

Whereupon several other players were found and the game began. At first the "Count" was very stupid, so that they lowered his handicap out of charity. But all of a sudden the little musician began to play in earnest. The balls flew round the table, into pockets, and counting extraordinary scores. There was money on the game, and the tiny Professor, finishing his string with a rush, exclaimed triumphantly:

"Ah, gentlemen, I am so glad to be your guest. Thees game I shall always so mooch have love! Shall we have the revenge?"

But nobody wanted revenge, because Warry Payne, who is not bad at the cue, had been filled with despair. As for Nagle, he had fainted. Both had believed they were entertaining an "angel unawares."

With the happy New Year comes the swearing off,

One shuts off his whisky, one eschews cigars,

One will only tittle when he has a cough,

One will never, never traffic at the bars;

One forswears the races, one avoids the club,

One will each month pass o'er his money to his wife,

One protests his bibulous companions he must snub,

All make resolutions to lead a better life.

But ere the month is over the toper has a jag,

The man with gloomy features will tell his wife he's broke,

And the man who shunned tobacco will neither halt or lag

On his rush to the cigar shop to buy his daily smoke.

[In Rotterdam I saw a My pole—a fair white pole, around which many did dance. Its top was shining, and could be discerned far away. All would whirl about it as though mad with joy; but the long, gaudy strings which were attached to it seemed to me to make a very foolish, unprofitable game.—Excerpt from Sir W. Temple's letter to Lord Arlington.]

Once upon a time there was a fairy prince—also he was a magician. He lived by the sea, and he maintained an orchestra of enchanted seals to gladden his heart. They sang to him, and barked for him, and he talked back to them in their own language.

He was filled with pride over his possessions, which were great, and was always glad to give everything he had away. Only there was a misfortune attached to his gifts. For instance, once he presented a beautiful white cat to his friend, President Harrison. It staid with the nation's Executive one week, and then crept back. Another time, he bought a rubber doll on a corner for a street waif, but, when he tossed it to the child, it bounded back into his pocket, which he considered a lucky omen. So magical was his touch that a red-hot stove has been known not to burn his fingers as he carried it. Sometimes he would invite the Pharisees to his banquets, and often the Scribes. Whenever he wanted to give anything away he would ask the Scribes to visit him while he did it.

A scribe on a daily newspaper would go to his city editor and whisper mysteriously:

"The Prince is going to give the entire city to San Francisco!"

"You don't mean it!"

"Yes, I do, he's sent for me to go to breakfast with him and hear all about it!"

"Go by all means! It's a capital story."

Whereupon the scribe would visit the Princely Magician, and be as early to the breakfast as he could. But he would also find all the other scribes of the Press Club there before him, to his amazement and delight.

After which they would be ushered in, the entire company, to the dining hall, and before the august presence of the Prince himself. Zinfandel would flow like soup, and soup would flow like water.

Then, when the merriment was at its height, the Prince would rise from his throne, and, holding high a goblet of red wine, would say:

"My friends, I am about to present our beautiful city of San Francisco to the City and County of San Francisco. I have that intention. Of course you will never mention this, because my hospitality is so sacred. Also, my friends, I shall give away all my poor seals, together with my stuffed whale. I am a patriot, you see. Besides, I mean to build that grand library at the Park, where I shall put my original copy of the Koran, my original copy of the Zenda Vesta, and my original autograph copy of all Shakespeare's works. They are all genuine, gentlemen, and they have expensive bindings on them. But I don't want you to talk about that! Promise me you won't! But now, to do all this, I am going to part with that which I dearly love, next week—those four hundred lots in the Richmond district; and I am even forced to sell them at auction, in order to provide the ready money for my library building! Ah, gentlemen, I don't wonder that you weep with me at my sorrow. I appreciate it with sadness and joy. But do not mention this auction of my dearest lots. It would affect my grief!"

Then, after the banquet, the Prince would confide to each scribe, privately, that he had been attracted to him greatly; that he had heard of his genius and talents; and that those qualities were necessary in the chief librarian of a great library. Also the Prince would at once take the scribe's exact address for future reference. "I always have so much liked your style," he would remark, parenthetically; "only I 'ox' you, don't mention this to no von."

At which the scribe would swear by the seals and the Richmond district, and all that was holy, that he would never disclose the Prince's intention to hint at his future librarianship. Then he would give way to the next scribe, who would hang upon the same honeyed hope.

Then did the scribes return homeward filled with joy. Once in the City Editor's room, the dialogue would be somewhat as follows:

CITY EDITOR—"What did the old guy want?"

SCRIBE (ferently)—"Waut? Why, man, he's in trouble! He's got to sell all his Richmond lots next week, so he can build the new Park Library. It's going to cost a quarter of a million dollars, and I have the photographed copy of the plans. As soon as the sale is finished the library will begin. He's put the library into a trust deed that he's going to protect from monopoly and corporatious till after he's dead."

CITY EDITOR—"Give it two columns—but, say, let the advertising solicitor look at it first. I went through that old song and dance years ago—but then you're young!"

The scribe collapses, and mourns over the skeptical and brutal minded City Editor.

A slap the doughty Willis got,
Deftly placed, and strong and hot
Upon his cheek it fell.
And ever since that bloodless blow
A clang has echoed to and fro—
The clang of a brazen hell.

Our Eligibles

AS the New Year opens new hopes spring in the breast, new aspirations, new resolves. Life's threads, which with some of us have become so tangled, will surely be unravelled in the New Year. "Fortune favors the brave," we are told, so with brave hearts we gaze hopefully to the future. Possibly no class of people are more prone to this than our fond parents of society, and to aid their vision of the opening year we append a list of our eligibles as naturally the object of most interest to those of them who have daughters, for as time rolls on there are many sweet blossoms remaining unplucked from the parental stem.

First on the list, unquestionably, in point of millions, stands young Walter Hobart, who is in possession of the wealth left him by his father. Mr. Hobart has youth, good looks, and a nice disposition in addition to his money, but, unfortunately for the pretty buds—so far at least as can be judged—up to the present his attentions have been more devoted to horses than young ladies. However, if dame gossip speaks truly, the new year will see a change.

James D. Phelan, also a millionaire in his own right, is a much older man than Hobart, and therefore more experienced in the wiles of the beau sexe. Of stout build and medium height, Mr. Phelan is an attractive figure and scrupulously neat in attire. Of cultivated taste, a patron of the Fine Arts, and an agreeable conversationalist, a man of irreproachable character and habits, he would indeed be a prize for any woman.

Richard, familiarly styled "Dick" Tobin, while not so rich as either of the above gentlemen, is yet a parti worth capturing by the buds on fortune bent. He is one of the heirs to the large estate left by his father, and spends it right royally, they say.

Walter L. Dean is another son of a wealthy sire, but his father being very much alive, his fortune, to any extent, is in the prospective stage. Walter Dean, however, possesses other attractions of good looks and good breeding which make him very popular in society, and the income allowed him by his father would more than satisfy the wants of the average aspirant for its sharing, but like Jim Phelan, he seems very difficult to capture, though many nets have been woven for that purpose.

Charles A. Baldwin, only son of the late wealthy member of the mercantile house of C. Adolph Low & Co., is a young man held in much favor as a marriageable possibility by mammas and daughters alike. Not only is Charley rich, but his good looks none can dispute, his almond shaped eyes doing a vast amount of destruction when he chooses to use them.

Ed Donahoe, the youngest son of the late pioneer banker, is a tall, broad shouldered young fellow of fine manly appearance, but, the girls say, very hard to get at, as since the death of his father he has devoted himself assiduously to his mother's society. So the girl who "goes in" for young Ed's conquest must do it through the maternal.

George Newhall is another young man of muscular build, and the only bachelor left in a family of brothers. The girls say the records made by his married brothers is a great thing in George's favor, and soft eyes glance very sweetly in his direction at all the functions of society.

Dr. Harry Tevis, eldest son of our leading capitalist, and, like George Newhall, the only one left of the Tevis boys for the selection of our matrimonially inclined young ladies, is one of the most eligible of the list of beaux so ranked. Dr. Tevis is a handsome young fellow of large build, blonde hair and moustache, and blue eyes. He is devoted to music and very artistic in temperament, being skilled in the decorative line. Various are the reasons assigned in the swim for the difficulty of Dr. Tevis's capture. One says he is a general admirer; another that he prefers married women to flirt with, and yet another that he has left his heart in New York. She who gets him will be a fortunate woman.

W. B. Page, the last of the Page brothers left single, will no doubt make as exemplary a Benedict as they each and all do, it being a saying among their friends that no matter how gay they are as bachelors, matrimony steadies them like a rock. Will Page is the possessor of a fortune also, his twenty-fifth birthday having seen the distribution of the large estate left by his father, the late Dr. Page, of Valparaiso.

Robbie Eyre, another remaining sprig from a full branch, is now in a position to marry any reasonably minded young woman, having been left a legacy by a lately deceased friend which will make a desirable addition to the allowance given him by his father.

"The Boardman boys," as the girls style them, are all eligible for matrimony. Tall, slender, gentlemanly young men all of them, and two especially gifted with the genial nature so marked a feature of their father. They are four in number, so the girls can take their choice, though Mr. Chauncey Boardman seems the chief favorite.

Joe Grant must be included in a list of our eligible men, although, being a widower, he is not among the younger beaux. Mr. Grant is the only child of his father, Adam Grant, the well-known dry goods importer. He is what the world calls "well fixed" financially, and no doubt his previous experience in matrimony will render him doubly to be desired as a husband by our belles.

J. W. Byrne, like Callingham, his brother, is a man any woman might be proud to captivate. Tall, fine looking, and thoroughly a man of the world, he (again like his brother) will be a fish requiring skillful angling to land.

Allan St. John Bowie is also of this type, a young man of much refinement of taste, good breeding, and the je ne sais quoi which belongs to good birth. Handsome and wealthy, no wonder the women all rave over him, but he, too, seems difficult of capture.

Harry Babcock, the youngest son of a California pioneer, has inherited a goodly share of his father's wealth, and is, moreover, a very agreeable beau. His tastes incline to polo and golf, in the latter of which he is an enthusiast, so the girl to capture this swain must be interested in out-door sports.

The Martin boys, Peter and Andrew, are fortunate in being sons of a very rich mother, consequently they receive a large share of smiles and attention from the girls.

Harry Simpkins is a great favorite; rich, jolly, and generous, good-looking and young, he can take his pick from our garden of girls.

Harry Holbrook is also one of fortune's favorites. The son of a rich father, popular in society, and sure to make a delightful head of a house when he establishes one.

A most highly "eligible" is Col. Fred Crocker, who, although a widower with several children, is so charming and so rich any woman would gladly consent to tread life's pathway as his companion.

Claude Terry Hamilton is a decided eligible, for although not a man of millions, he is more than "well off," and is also a very attractive man personally. The girls have been anxious to win his favor for many a day.

For those of our belles who would like to be "an old man's darling" rather than a young man's slave, there are several elderly beaux to choose from. Tom Maddeu, George Marye, and Winfield Jones have ornamented society since our own grandmothers' days, but they are such dyed in the wool old bachelors they are almost to be regarded as hopeless, although eligible.

As a matter of course, there are many of our popular beaux who do not appear in this list because their claim to the title of being an eligible parti cannot be said to be sufficiently established to place them there.

Edwin Corrier

"Hear the Crier." "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

IT does look as though, fond as we are of licking the boots of the aristocracy of the old world, we will soon have to give it up as a regular profession, for they are turning out to be such an uncommonly common set of people. At least that is our luck in this city. Every time one of them heaves in sight, we get on our store clothes and lubricate our tongues, and begin licking their boots, and thanking God they do not feel too good to come among us for a short time. But somehow, we are mightily out of luck or something, for the more we get to know them the more they seem to be very like the commonest sort of our own people. If we are wrong we hope our contemporaries will take up their defense and point out a few instances where-in they are half as good as any good sort of American.

WE are averse to misjudging a whole section of the English people, and that, too, the one which considers itself about the very best; but if we pass any judgment at all upon the English aristocracy from what we see here, and it should turn out that our judgment couldn't be appealed from, it's going to be mighty bad for all the future visitors of that titled gang. They are so nervous and fearful that they will not be taken for aristocrats, that they generally act in such a way that they are in no way likely to be mistaken for gentlemen. The last feat recorded, entitling either to public notice, is that one of them kicked his whilom secretary out of a public bath house into a public street. That may have proved he was a noble lord, but it did not tend to prove that he was a gentleman. We probably have an altogether wrong idea of what a lord ought to be. We are fast learning what the specimens of European aristocracy are, and if these are fair samples of the goods, we incline to the opinion that we don't care to invest in titles or the titled nobility at any price. And we are likely to remain of the opinion that there's nothing much better made of the human kind than an American gentleman—as little as he resembles an English lord, and—perhaps because he does so little resemble him.

JUST now they are not faring much better with the English aristocracy in New York than we are here. The Earl of Dunraven, some time ago, by a communication in reference to the yacht race made prominent some personal characteristics, which are in this country held to be the exclusive characteristics of blackguards. He has recently crossed the Atlantic, unfortified with evidence to sustain his bluster against the fairness of the defeat of his yacht, and thereby displayed the temerity and indiscretion of an ass. In the interval between the meetings of the committee of gentlemen appointed to hear and determine the whole matter, and before the whole evidence of the respondents was in, seeing that he was overwhelmingly beaten, he escaped with his counsel and soon put the rolling ocean between him and America. We shall be mistaken if, by any estimable silence, he leaves us a chance to think him a gentleman in any sense, and if he does not, by some utterance in which he will display the characteristics aforesaid, soon put himself out of the category of persons worthy of consideration in any polite society.

THERE is not now, and never will be, anything like being completely "swell." If we are not of the swell set we are nowhere, for verily there is only the swell set, and the rest are simply not to be mentioned. Some of us think that we are decidedly provincial here, and have a good deal to learn before we can hold a candle to those who know how to do the correct thing. But of course we shall be told that we are simply weak and uninformed. For there is a small crowd of us, who have been East and across the ocean blue, and have taken it all in through the pores, and consequently know it all. Of course, we are now alluding to our high society, the dudes par excellence, the fellows who are in it for all they are worth. For instance, the Horse Show, you know, and how we did it. But, by Jove, there has unfortunately been "a chiel among us takin' notes," and faith, he has "prented it." If we believe what he says, we are really not in it at all, that is, most of us are not. Why, he has dared to say that Hobart's harness was "flashy," because he had "half swage horse shoe buckles instead of square wire buckles." Then his "medallion monogram over the hips on the breeching was not in good taste." This of itself is enough to make the whole swell set hang their heads, for if Hobart doesn't know how to dress a horse, in heaven's name, who does? But, thank that same heaven, his coachmen wore hats "well shaped, with not too much bell," and that was antidote to the bitter hane. Parrott was altogether wrong, too, and "one of the worst mistakes" he made "was in leaving off breeching and using a kicking-strap." Great Heavens! mind you, that was just one of the worst mistakes. But all this seems so sad that we have to defer writing of the rest till another paragraph.

THERE was enough fault found with the rest of our great Horse Show to make our whole Dudedom sick through and through. Why, Hobart's horses were seen in public with "elbow bits instead of the Buxton!" Can Hobart and his horses hold up their heads after that? Then, while "his coach was up to park form," he lost his standing by having "an extra brake on behind to be worked by his servant." Simple soul, not to know that a good "whip can readily call upon his servants to put on the skid provided for the purpose in the event of the brake not holding." It is so foolish to avoid breaking your neck and that of your wife or sweetheart, unless you do it in the correct way!

MR. E. Duplessis Beylard received a little gratuitous advertising of his qualities as a whip at the Horse Show when Mr. Samuel Walter Taylor got down to work on his article about that famous society event. Mr. Exquisite Duplessis Beylard did not drive his own team because he didn't own one, and, if it depends upon his capacity to make money enough to buy one he probably never will. But he hasn't lived as a petted darling in the arms of luxury furnished by other people all these years, without escaping any special humiliation in driving other people's horses at a show. Mr. Exquis—etc., etc., Beylard on this occasion helped Mr. Hobart win a third prize by driving "Mr. Hobart's team of browns." It must have been the "browns" that took the prize by reason of their own special virtues, for Mr. Taylor intimates that Mr. Exquis—etc., etc., Beylard had on exhibition so many of his own faults that Hobart got only the third prize. For, says Mr. Taylor, who knows it all, his "driver made all the mistakes of the first prize winner," "none of the drivers were in proper costume," including, of course, Mr. Beylard, and then, "he was additionally at fault in being without bearing reins." If Mr. Beylard don't go and bide his head after that it is because it is so swollen that he can't find a bole big enough to hide it in. And yet Mr. Exquis—etc., etc., Beylard thinks himself rather a fine whip. And he was so happy driving Hobart's browns in society that it is an infernal shame to hurt his vanity or intimate that possibly he doesn't know it all.

IT would have been very simple in us to suggest that when Charley Baldwin was driving the B'lingum club coach there was any defect in his attire, because, why is he Charley Baldwin at all, if a newspaper critic on the Pacific coast can give him points. And yet, the New York critic of that famous horse show, that has now gone into history with all its virtues and vanities, has dared to say that he "committed the unpardonable faux pas (and put it in French, too) of appearing on the box in full evening dress." Why, didn't this gentleman manage a Huut Ball a little while ago, and wasn't it the correct thing for his chief parasites to appear in scarlet coats? And wasn't it quite English, you know, so far as it went? And the mere matter of forgetting about the knee breeches didn't make it much, if any, less awfully swell. But this little matter of faux pas in costume has got into a New York journal, and must now be known across the water. There seems to be here cause for offense, but of course we can't offer any advice about how to settle it. And yet if Mr. Baldwin can get acquainted with Mr. Willis Polk, he can probably learn how to obtain the satisfaction due to a gentleman, and possibly be able to borrow his three plumbers as a body-guard.

SPORTS IN 1895

By W. W. Naughton.

A RETROSPECT of the sport happenings of the year that has passed away gives rise to the suspicion that the people of San Francisco comprise a fickle community. There may be those who will consider this opinion as something in the nature of a mild libel on the dwellers by the Golden Gate, and to them I would say: "What has become of trotting and baseball—the two branches of the many in the domain of pastime which are wholly and solely American, both in origin and development?"

There is no gainsaying the fact that they have, for the time being at any rate, been shouldered into a condition bordering on innocuous desuetude by newer and more exciting forms of sport, for the thoroughbred has ousted the trotter from public favor, and the chrysanthemum-locked footballer has usurped the place of the dabbler in base hits and home runs.

It may be that the good people of this city are only following the dictates of fashion in matters sporting, just as they do in dress and in the style of their indoor entertainments, and that trotting and baseball will come in vogue again just as surely as will square-toed shoes and square dances, but the records of '95 plainly indicate that the time of reaction is not yet.

There is, undoubtedly, something more inspiring and more blood quickening in the sight and sound of a squadron of thoroughbreds sweeping along than in gazing at a handful of horses driven to harness at a uniform and monotonous gait. So, too, while slides to base and three-haggers are eminently exciting in their way, they seem to lose their power to enthuse when stacked up against the spine-jarring tackle, the mad rush around the end, and the Douybrook-like spectacle of a score of squirming footballers all tangled up like worms in a bait box.

These comparisons are drawn mainly to support the suggestion that it will be pretty hard to oust the running-track and the gridiron field from the affections of the multitude. The forms of sport which obtain thereon have the genuine tahasco relish of excitement to them, and the public palate is more likely to yearn for a still more pungent condiment than to content itself with the moderately-seasoned home-made dishes of the old days.

There is yet another Richmond in the field in the matter of sporting novelties, and that is 'cycling. It has proven more contagious than the grippe, and its effects on old-established lines of sport are very marked. It has absorbed the flower of the local athletic clubs, and to its baneful influence, as much as to the lack of public patronage and encouragement, may be traced the fact that the beautiful little Olympic Park, on the road to the beach, is as neglected and forlorn-looking as Goldsmith's deserted village, and the further fact that the outdoor men of the Olympic, Acme, and Reliance have discarded their spiked shoes for pedaling pumps, and are more wrapped up in flying starts and Class B qualifications than they are in improving existing records on the cinder path.

Wheeling has also drawn into its maelstrom those who were wont to grace the grand stands and bleachers at field days and baseball games, and a trip out through the Park roadways on any fine Sunday in the season, which has just closed, would suggest that an athletic tourney scheduled for that particular day would, in all likelihood, go short of patronage. Why? Because everybody seemed to be a wheel.

The pastime of cycling increased over two fold during '95. New clubs, ranging in membership from 10 to 150, were formed all over San Francisco, and many fine club houses sprung into existence. The Olympics, Acmes, and the Reliance have paid particular attention to the sport, and the local men have done their share of establishing world's records. Foster's half-mile at Napa (48 secs.) was the best performance of the year, and his mile (1.46 3-5) will stand a lot of hammering. McFarland, too, has constituted himself a mark for the wheelmen of the world, by trundling off two-thirds of a mile in 1.25 1-5 at San Jose.

While field days have been phenomenally scarce in and around San Francisco, and events seem to denote that the amateur runners, jumpers, and shot-putters have diverted their surplus energies to football and wheeling operations, the triumphant tour of the University of California athletes through the East plainly indicates that there is no lack of high-class amateur talent at this end. The Berkeley boys who sported the blue and gold across the Rockies during the summer, met and defeated Princeton, tied the University of Pennsylvania, rated fourth in the American championship, defeated Union College, the University of Illinois, and the Denver Athletic Club, won the western championship at Chicago, and were beaten in individual contest by the cracks of the Chicago Club alone. This, in my opinion, is a record that California may well be proud of.

In summing up the sports of the year it may be said that thoroughbred horse-racing, football, and cycling have advanced wonderfully in public favor, while trotting, baseball, and field athletics have retrograded. The Olympic Club has succeeded in keeping alive a flicker of interest in amateur baseball by maintaining a crackjack, all-conquering team, but professional baseball is moribund, to all intents and purposes.

There has been a slight lull in rowing—also owing, mainly, to the development of a capable junior crew by the Olympic Club—and yachting showed greater signs of activity than it did in 1894.

Trap-shooting at live birds, while not losing any of its immediate votaries, has got to be a pastime from which the general public seems to keep aloof, while the disc cracking industry has come into prominence with a bound, the saucer smashers now outnumbering the pigeon-maimers ten to one. Tennis has been, if anything, quieter than in preceding years, cricket has not broken through its British environments to any palpable extent, and golf and polo are still as exclusively fashionable as are pink teas and Friday Night Cotillions.

FOR some time past many ladies have had their crest or monogram painted upon their bicycle, as they would upon their brougham, but a development of the idea has taken place which is hardly in good taste. It consists of having the owner's name, and very often address, painted upon the frame of the machine. Certainly it enables the rider to identify her bicycle, but most riders require no assistance in picking out their machine from a dozen others, as the "personality" of every bicycle is quite distinct. No one would have a name and address painted on the door of a carriage, unless he wished to evade the vehicle tax.

The splendid evel trophy which the California Associated Cycling Clubs have, been presented with by Bicycle Cup.

Baker & Hamilton, is a graceful solid silver cup, over a yard high. It cost five hundred dollars, at the least, and is the most sumptuous prize ever offered. The Club winning it three years in succession owns it forever. Thursday an exhibition tour of the Coast will begin when this famous cup will be exhibited, and every Bicycle Club this side of the Rockies shall see it.

NEARLY every army has now a bicycle corps. In Germany six men of every regiment are mounted on wheels to act as scouts.

December is the prime time for oysters, and no one is equal to Moraghan, of the California Market, when the freshest native or imported are concerned.

MULLER

REMOVED TO 824 MARKET STREET, PHELAN BUILDING

A Book of the Week.* In our last issue we pointed out that Richard Henry Stoddard, in the N. Y. Mail and Express, says that "The Letters of Matthew Arnold are disappointing because they tell so much of the home life of the great writer and so little of interest to the general public. Mr. Stoddard is one of the ablest American critics, but we fail to see his reasons for this statement. True, Matthew Arnold's Letters contain much that has little interest outside the family circle, but then look at his criticisms of Tennyson, Herbert Spencer, Froude, Browning, Ruskin, Disraeli, Palmerston, Wordsworth, and many other great ones in literature, and, in face of all this, we question the accuracy of Mr. Stoddard's conclusions. On the contrary, we believe that there have not been many published letters of great litterateurs, except those of Grey, Cowper, Lord Byron and Keats, that have so much interest for the general reader as those of Matthew Arnold, and while there is much that can be passed over without loss, there is also much that is valuable to the student and the bookworm."

We now find that our position on this question has been challenged in certain places, and we are, therefore, obliged to explain our views. We cheerfully admit Mr. Stoddard's superiority as a critic, but we deny his infallibility. We believe we quoted him correctly, at least we hope so, and we think we can prove that the letters of Matthew Arnold are crowded with expressions of opinions on other great people, which cannot but have a living interest to the literary world at large. Look, for instance, at what he says about Napoleon. Here it is:

"I have also been reading Las Casas, and his (Napoleon's) energy and precision in arranging details never struck me so much as now."

True, the Napoleonic memoirs published lately do not sustain this estimate Las Casas placed on Napoleon's accuracy in detail, yet is not the opinion of Matthew Arnold on this subject of interest to us all?

Again, see what he says about Ernest Renan: "I thought I would tell you of a Frenchman whom I saw in Paris the other day, Ernest Renan, between whose line of endeavor and my own I imagine there is considerable resemblance, that you might have a look at some of his books if you liked. The difference is, perhaps, that he tends to inculcate morality, in a high sense of the word, upon the French nation as what they most want, while I tend to inculcate intelligence, also in a high sense, upon the English nation, as what they most want; but with respect both to morality and intelligence, I think we are singularly at one in our ideas, and also with respect to the progress and the established religion of the day."

Or take his estimate of Tennyson and Browning, which is as follows: "I have less poetic sentiment than Tennyson and less intellectual vigor and abundance than Browning; yet, because I have, perhaps, more of a fusion of the two than either of them, and have more regularly applied that fusion to the main line of modern development, I am likely enough to have my turn as they have had theirs."

This may be considered daring, but it was too daring for Arnold, was in some respects more striking as a poet, than either Browning or Tennyson, and his "Stanzas from the Grand Chartreuse" contains elements of loftiness which we fail to find surpassed in either of his two great rivals. But look again at his long criticism on Tennyson's "Idylls of the Kings," in which he says that Tennyson, "with all his temperament and artistic skill, is deficient in intellectual power; and no modern poet can make very much of his business unless he is pre-eminently strong in this."

Who can tell us that even these few quotations do not compensate for the mass of uninteresting matter which the letters contain. But let us read on, and hear him tell us that he could "never like Ruskin" and that he regarded Swinburne as a "pseudo-Shelley," while he says of Burke: "What makes Burke stand so splendidly among politicians is that he treats politics with his thought and imagination, and, therefore, whether one agrees with him or not, he always interests you, stimulates you, and does you good."

And of politicians, what can be more interesting than his views of Pitt, Walpole, and Peel, as writing of Lord Palmerston he says: "I do not deny his personal qualities, but, as to calling him a great minister like Pitt, Walpole, or Peel, and talking of his death as a great national calamity, why, taking his career from 1830, when his importance really begins, to the present time, he found his country the first power in the world's estimation, and he leaves it the third; of this no person with eyes to see, or ears to hear, and opportunities for using them, can doubt." We may not agree with Matthew Arnold in all this, but who will say that the letters that contain such opinions are not of living interest to the student and the litterateur? Why, his opinion of Wordsworth alone is worth the trouble of reading his letters, for he says: "He can show a body of work superior to what any other English poet, except Shakespeare and Milton, can show, and his body of work is more interesting than Milton's, though not so great."

* * * Wordsworth's body of work, to keep to that phrase, is superior to the body of work of any continental poet of the last hundred years, except Goethe; superior to that of Schiller, Heine, Musset, Victor Hugo."

And then Burns he says: "Burns is a beast, with splendid gleams, and the medium in which he lived, Scotch peasants, Scotch Presbyterianism, and Scotch drink, is repulsive." Of course, to a refined intellect, such as Arnold possessed, it was to be expected that Burns could not be acceptable, but the world has been more charitable to the Scotch poet than Arnold, and it is better that it should be so. But we must stop, and yet we could quote much more if we had the space at our disposal, to prove that the position we have taken on Matthew Arnold's Letters and Mr. Stoddard's criticism, is justified by facts, and we express the hope that we have, in this brief review, sustained that position to the letter. Nor must it be forgotten that if Matthew Arnold was, in his letters, severe on the Americans as a people, he was also severe on the English, and, in view of his unquestioned honesty, we can overlook many of his unkind remarks. But, take those letters all in all, they appear to us to be full of interest, and this opinion, we believe, is shared by the majority of people who have read them.

* "The Letters of Matthew Arnold."

Seventy years ago it was generally believed that what is now the State of Wisconsin was destined to be forever an Indian reserve. This project was proposed by Morse, who was then the best of American geographers, and it was supported by Calhoun, who was then Secretary of War. Wisconsin was then considered so far off that Morse told the Indians that they would never be disturbed, because the white man would not dream of going so far into the wilderness. Until 1832, it was believed that the territory was too far north for successful agriculture, and now that State numbers nearly 2,000,000 souls. All this, and much more, we are told in detail in "Unnamed Wisconsin," a book that cannot be of great interest to the residents of Wisconsin. It is a pity, however, that a book so full of research should also be full of errors. There are printers' errors, proof-readers' errors, and errors about the explorers and missionaries of old. But the book is so good that we can overlook its mistakes, even when they blur the pages with information that is not accurate.

"In the Redwoods," by Fannie De C. Miller, is neatly printed and well illustrated. It is a poem of some twenty verses, and it is, we presume, the author's first appearance in type. If so, we hope she will try again.

Who is George Hartou that has written a poem called "In Unknown Seas"? Whoever he is he should seriously ponder on the instability of the Muse. Here, for instance, is how he describes California:

"Vine land and pine land afar by the West,
Wine land and shine land, by all blessings blest;
Benign land, divine land, that God loveth best!"

Just think of describing California as "shine land," as if this State were made up of colonies of foreign boot-blacks. Crude, defective, and mediocre is our verdict of this poem, and we venture to believe that we shall not be alone in our views.

An interesting discussion is now going on in the columns of The Nation as to the educational standard of the French peasant, before and after the revolution. The discussion arose out of something Mr. Stanley Weyman said in "The Red Cockade" about the ignorance of the French peasant of 1789, a statement The Nation denies. Mr. Weyman contends that the French peasant of pre-revolutionary days was more illiterate than the French peasant of 1800 or after, and we all know that Mr. Weyman is an authority on this subject. But if the author of "The Red Cockade" knows a good deal about pre-revolutionary France, so does the Abbé Maggiolo, and, of the two, we would accept the testimony of the ecclesiastic before that of the novelist, because the churchman has given proof that there were fewer schools in France immediately after the revolution than there were before it, and this is something the novelist omits. We have no space at our disposal to go into details, but anyone who is interested in the subject can get further information in the Revue de la Révolution, vol. 4, p. 117.

And so here comes "The Marvelous Adventures of Sir John Maundeville, Kt.," again. How they bring us back to our boyhood days, the days when Baron Munchausen, Ferdinand Mundy Pinto, and Robinson Crusoe held sway, and when the mind was aflame with the wonderful and the strange. Of course, the good Knight has always been doubted, and his travels have, more or less, been regarded as a myth, but, whether true or false, it is certain that his book is a classic, and, with the exception of the Bible, no book has been more extensively translated. But Maundeville occupies the same relation to English literature that Chaucer does to its poetry, and they were, too, contemporaries.

Mr. Stead, the editor of the Review of Reviews, has determined to issue a number of the best works of the best authors in a condensed form. He will not "boil down" the books, but he will give the best chapters and the most famous scenes of each book. He is to do this because he is convinced that an ignorant public will not read a book at length, and so he will produce the best works of the best authors in a somewhat similar form to his Review of Reviews. Some time ago, when Miss Braddon attempted to "abridge" the works of Scott, there was a great hubbub, and the literary world will wonder if Mr. Stead can be more successful than she promised to be.

"Love and Laughter," a collection of posthumous verse by the late Mr. James G. Burnett, is not without poems of merit. Here and there we find evidence of some force and poetic conception, but to say that Mr. Burnett belonged to the same class of poets as Hood and Præd, as some critics claim, is, to our mind, to say far too much. Hood and Præd were finished artists, while Mr. Burnett was a mere amateur, and he is no more to be classed with Hood or Præd than starlight is to be compared with sunlight. That Mr. Burnett may have had the material for good work we have no right to question, but he was nothing but a fairly good versifier to the end of his life.

"The significance of the gradations of curvature or angularity through which outlines are made to describe shapes cannot be fully understood except in connection with the next way in which they have been said to be made representative—namely, regularity. This is a result primarily of like effects produced by measurements, just as in poetry and music it is a result of like effects produced by measures. All outlines surround both spaces and shapes. These like effects may be produced by resemblances either in one or in the other."

"The Golden Rock" is a story of adventure and exploration in South Africa. Its episodes are improbable and amazing, and there is a lack of coherency about the book that makes it of little value and of small interest. In fact, the book is amateurish, weak, and full of expletives. "Thank God" and "Thank Heaven" are too liberally interpolated in the dialogue, and, besides, we fail to see what connection there is between a torpedo-catcher and South African exploration, and the story does not answer the query.

Now, gentle reader, do you blame us for throwing away the book in despair.

As a seeker after knowledge we last week took up a book called "Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture, as Representative Arts," and, after reading about one-third of it, we threw it down in despair. It was too much for our limited comprehension, and we could not understand it. We had a headache from the heroic effort we made to unravel some of the sentences, and, unless we stopped, we feared our Library Table would go off on a spirit dance of its own. But, for fear of being charged with a lack of perspicacity, may we ask some of our readers to "riddle me, riddle me" the following extract from this book:

Books are to disappear; men of letters are not to be called writers, but narrators; the taste for literary style is to die out, libraries are to be transformed into phonographics, in all newspaper offices there will be speaking halls, where the editors will record in a clear voice the news received by telephonic despatch, and the phonograph will enter into the daily life of the people, and will form part of the stock of every public place, hotel, restaurant, and so on. So says a French scientist.

Mr. Robert Buchanan is a Scotch poet and novelist of somewhat melodramatic tendencies. He is uneven in excellence—an able delineator of character, but his descriptive passages are often overwrought and wordy. His book "Lady Kilpatrick" is, however, to be admired for the temerity it shows in placing "virtue triumphant, vice vanquished" before us, and the book comes as a restful change after a surfeit of emotional literature.

"Early Knowledge of Electricity" is a book that is likely to find interesting readers throughout the world. The author, Mr. Park Benjamin, Ph. D., L. L. B., has given us a book that is full of information, much of which, although old, is put before the world in a new and a highly interesting form. The book is of interest to the layman as well as to the scientist, and it cannot fail to command attention.

[T seems rather a pity, for the sake of the uniformity of things, that in these days of Anglo-mania a more extended knowledge of the standing of titled Britishers does not obtain among the writers for the daily press of our city. Apparently these scribblers find it impossible to place the grades of English aristocracy. They insist upon "my lord"-ing Talbot Clifton, and the latest exhibition of ignorance is the bestowal of nobility upon a Scotch "Sir," who, as a baronet, is not entitled to be so ranked. How amused these foreign tourists must be at getting brevet rank, so to speak, in our republican land.

Harry Dimond presided over the "low jinks" at the Bohemian Club Saturday night. The jinks were an immense success, but the only skeleton at the feast was the fact that so few members did anything to amuse, and so many invited guests did the entertaining. The high jinks are dull enough very often, but the low jinks never; and this one was no exception to the rule; songs, mummery, and mirth chased the small hours away. But the climax came when that prens chevalier, Louis Parrott, in a moment of exuberance called for three hundred cigars. They were brought to him by the waiter, and forthwith Mr. Parrott proceeded to mount the stage.

"Gentlemen," he exclaimed, hugging his pile of cigar-boxes; "Gentlemen, I am not going to sing a song, but I will give you an imitation of Dounybrook Fair." And straightway he proceeded to scatter the cigars broadcast into the amazed audience.

If ever a scramble took place, it was at that memorable moment. The members jumped frantically for the spoils, and struggled fiercely for the scattering missiles. It was a scene of wild confusion. Coats, collars, watch-chains, cuffs, vests, and eye-glasses were torn apart in the fray which ensued.

Meanwhile Parrott took his cab homeward, and every body else looked wrecked and dazed—perhaps a little foolish.

They say that about a thousand dollars worth of garments were destroyed for those three hundred cigars.

The passers by on one of our fashionable avenues have been somewhat mystified by the sounds proceeding from a spacious mansion thereon. Frequently of an afternoon, sometimes of a morning, a sound of violent scuffling could be heard coming from an upper storeroom, intermingled with cries of pain or derision, and now and then a heavy fall. Comment was general in the neighborhood, and at length a committee of two old ladies essayed to probe the mystery by a call of enquiry at the residence, where investigation proved the young ladies of the family and several of their girl friends were trying to outdo the collegiate style in a game of football!!!

The remark is frequently heard made by visitors to San Francisco, "One sees so many pretty girls in the streets and at the theatres, but where do they abide?" If they were at the recent elegant ball given by Mrs. Roth, wife of a leading Hebrew citizen, they would see that the greatest number of pretty girls in our city are in Jewish circles.

On dit society will have a charming matrimonial engagement to chatter over early in the new year. The prospective match, says rumor, is between the nephew of one of our oldest society beaux and the granddaughter of a late grain king, and was arranged during the visit to the rural home of a popular young matron recently.

The girls are gushing over what they call the "ideal" match, which the devotion of young Hobart to a pretty belle of the season bids fair to be. Wealth and beauty united to youth on both sides certainly go far to justify the "gush."

Shakespeare says, "What's in a name?" But our society did not think of this when getting a shock, a few mornings ago, by reading in a morning paper the big head lines, "Mrs. Fred Sharon Divorced." The pros and cons of the probability and possibility of such an event occupied the swagger set more than the display of their Christmas gifts until it was ascertained the party alluded to was the wife of a cousin of our own "Fred Sharon," and bearing the same name.

DISCONTENT.—N. O. TIMES-DEMOCRAT.

TWO boats rocked on the river
In the shadow of leaf and tree,
One was in love with the harbor,
One was in love with the sea.

The one that loved the harbor
The winds of fate outbore,
But held the other, longing,
Forever against the shore.

The one that rests on the river,
In the shadow of leaf and tree,
With wistful eyes looks ever
To the one far out at sea.

The one that rides the billow,
Though sailing fair and fleet,
Looks back to the peaceful river,
To the harbor safe and sweet.

One frets against the quiet
Of the moss-grown, shaded shore;
One sighs that it may enter
The harbor never more.

One wearies of the dangers
Of the tempest's rage and wail,
One dreams amid the lilies
Of a far-off snowy sail.

The regular annual meeting of the stockholders of the Bullion Mining Company will be held at the office of the company, room 20, No. 331 Pine St., San Francisco, Cal., on

It was very nearly not a merry Christmas at all this year, with all the bloody-thirsty rumors filling the air and Wall street in a frenzy of panic. Three very wild days we had, several of the big brokers failing under the strain, and since, for three or four days, we are as mild as a young May moon; conservative—tolerant, reasonable, and deprecating the possibility of warfare in the most Christian manner. But the talk did a lot of damage while it lasted. It stirred up a great deal of latent energy and patriotism, also, and the towns of Hoboken and Hackensack, which correspond in playful allusion to Milpitas and Petaluma, girded on their armor to the extent of enlisting recruits in new born militia companies, which may never develop out of their swaddling clothes into fully organized creations.

Every one who has been able to keep war and stocks out of his conversation talks Guilbert, the divine, the ineffable, unspeakable Yvette. New York is quite mad over her.

Howard Gould gave a dinner last night at the Holland House to Miss Katherine Clemmons and her sister, Mrs. Overacker, of Pleasanton, Alameda. Miss Clemmons was very dazzling in a white satin gown, with American Beauty roses. James Brett Stokes has been very evident upon the avenue of late. He is doing New York this year under the wing of Creighton Webb, he of bappy memory in San Francisco.

Mrs. Dominique Verdenal is entertaining for the holidays her daughters, Mrs. Lee Grey and Mrs. Forsythe, of Fresno, California. Baron von Schlippenbach, the Russian Consul at Chicago, who was once well-known in California, is in town at the Clarendon. Miss Evelyn Aronson, who has been visiting New York for several months, is leaving for home this week. Miss Rose Sperling, of your city, was married here last night to A. H. Levy, and will go to California on a wedding tour. Harry Gillig and Frank Unger leave to-day for California, after a very jolly Christmas in New York. Doctor and Mrs. M. Hanford White, who spent a summer in San Francisco and Santa Barbara, have decided to go to the latter place this spring, and intend building a villa on the beautiful piece of property that Dr. White purchased during his visit. I am sure that very wide regret will be felt, by the many friends he left in California, at the news of the death of George Meinecke, which occurred at his father's home in Maribo, Denmark, on the sixth of December, after a long and most painful illness. He was very popular in San Francisco society with both men and women, and was a man of character and heart. W. R. Haxton was in town for a few days last week. He returns very soon, I am told, to England. Mrs. C. Fair, Mrs. Wilshire, and Mr. and Mrs. De Young are in Paris. A very curious robbery has just been discovered here. Mrs. Irving, the widow of Professor Irving, of Yale, and mother of the two beautiful young actresses—Isabel Irving, of the Lyceum Company, and Evangeline Irving, of the Stuart Robson Company—bired several months ago a box in the Lincoln Safe Deposit Company, and placed in it fifteen thousand dollars worth of bonds, the chief source of her income. She made, a few days ago, her first visit to the office since October, and, to her consternation and horror, found that all the bonds had been abstracted. Search has, thus far, proved fruitless, and there seems little chance of finding the thief who, no doubt, had a duplicate key to the box made, and was thus able, without question, to gain access to it. The poor lady is prostrated with grief.

It is currently reported that the good-looking and popular young actor,

"Ned" Ratcliffe, has found matrimony not concealer de rose, a view said to be shared by his handsome wife, and that a separation is imminent. Mrs. Ratcliffe is a daughter of "Pete" de Lacey, of pool-room renown.

PASSE PARTOUT.

AN Oriental room in a pretty bouse is a delightful luxury, and one that is not always easily managed. But, occasionally, the ambitious boushold picks up a Persian or Turkish relic from time to time, and gradually acquires a semblance of the real thing. But now the most magnificent opportunity is offered that ever happened in this part of the world. Colonel Will E. Fisher, the auctioneer, at 16 Post street, has on hand a large consignment from the Orient of Rugs, Mats, Saddle-bags, Carpets, Prayer Rugs, Draperies, Temple Hangings, Palace Embroideries, Divan Cushions—in short, all the accoutrements for an Arabian Nights' apartment, if one wants to make it. The sale goes on every day at two o'clock. Many of the articles are very ancient, well worth inspection. They have just been taken from the Customs House, and are warranted.

DURING all the war talk of the past fortnight, it should not be forgotten that a certain modest gentleman here in San Francisco, Mr. Edward A. Rix, P. E., has been the recipient of many congratulations from both army and naval officers; for the successful operation of the huge pneumatic dynamite gun, which would so well defend our port in an emergency, is managed entirely by the splendid Rix Air Compressor plant, constructed from his own designs.

If you have borrowed from health to satisfy the demands of business, if your blood is not getting that constant supply of fat from your food it should have, you must pay back from somewhere, and the somewhere will be from the fat stored up in the body.

The sign of this borrowing is thinness; the result, nerve-waste. You need fat to keep the blood in health unless you want to live with no reserve force—live from hand to mouth.

NEW YEAR'S EVE.—BY CLEMENT SCOTT.

KISS me good-night! the day is done,
Across life's bill the sun has set;
All! all! have left me; only one
Remains to love me—or forget?
We started seaward, to love's land,
Heart-glad with flowers, sun, and light—
Lost in the darkness, now we stand.
Kiss me good-night.

Kiss me good-night! our lovely year
Is folded up and put away;
The mists are round us, and a tear
Is all the pray'r I have to pray.
Why do I weep? I only know
Life's awful mystery aright.
You pause! and I have loved you so!
Kiss me good-night!

Kiss me good-night! no more be said.
For us what can to-morrow bring?
A cry of pain for what is dead?
Another New Year's song to sing?
Time's shadows close around us fast,
Our lamp of love is still alight;
O, that we might re-live the past!
Kiss me good-night!

SEA AND SKY.—N. Y. WORLD.

Long ago, when the world was new,
The sapphire sky and the ocean blue
Wedded one summer day;
And the sky still bends as the years go by,
And the ocean leaps to the bending sky,
For constant lovers are they.

But when a mist arises between,
The ocean grown with jealousy green,
His doubts to the listener tells,
He storms and frets, he rages and roars;
In furious wrath he beats his shores,
While his turbulent bosom swells.

The sky, though dark with a moment's frown,
Will tenderly from its height look down
With a radiant smile divine.
The green to blue with its magic skill
'Twill change, and the stormy ocean still,
And the soul of love will smile.

Pause, thou, my heart, and the lesson read,
When the darkness falls and with jealous speed,
The mists of doubt arise—
Fret not! 'twill pass, and thou wilt know
That the sun still shines with a fervent glow
In love's unchanging skies.

HER PROTEST.—C. G. O. IN THE LONDON SPECTATOR.

Because you see me light and gay
Playing with that man and with this,
You turn from me and coldly say,
"How frivolous she is!"

Because you hear my laugh ring out
Careless, amid the ballroom's glare;
You think that all I care about
In life is only there.

Because, to your disdainful look,
I answer with as cold a gaze,
You sneer: "My lady ill can brook
That one no homage pays."

Because you note my blush and smile,
When others bow before my throne,
You do not know that all the while
Your mastery I own.

You will not guess—I cannot tell—
That though their praises flatter me,
And though my kingdom please me well,
I'd leave it willingly.

To reign as queen beside your hearth,
To call my own your love, your life,
Would give up all I prize on earth,
To be your wife.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR A. C. FREESE.

Captain A. C. Freese.

ONE of the most patriotic citizens in these stirring times is our present Public Administrator, Captain A. C. Freese. This is his adopted country, for he was born in Denmark, and received his training at Oldeloke, in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany. Returning to his own country he served a number of years in the Danish navy with honor, and afterward, being ambitious, entered the merchant service. When the gold excitement in California broke out, Captain Freese sailed for the United States on the steamer Sir John Franklin, and afterward rounding the Horn on the ship Samuel Churchill, arrived at Panama when the Pioneers were crowding the Isthmus. It was the friendliness which he showed to so many of our old San Franciscans during his sojourn in Panama which endeared Captain Freese to their memory.

During the Civil War Captain Freese's conduct was patriotic. It was he who unloaded the ship Aquilla, at Hathaway's wharf. Precious freight was on board—the ironsides of our Monitor. The plates were safely and quickly transferred by him to the Mare Island Navy Yard. To-day Captain Freese says he would fight for the United States at an hour's notice if they would accept him.

In the contracting business, later on, Captain Freese conducted the splendid enterprise of the Oakland Creek jetties, where over sixty thousand tons of solid rock were used. Then again he put up forty thousand tons of sand for the Crystal Spring Reservoir.

As Public Administrator, however, Captain Freese has best shown his skill and honesty in dealing with our civil testaments—notably his sagacity and discrimination in the Blythe case.

COLONEL WILLIAM MACDONALD.

OF all the veteran insurance men, one is pre-eminent in this city—Colonel William Macdonald of the London and Lancashire Companies. Almost from boyhood he was drilled in underwriting, and, presently, he found himself in partnership with the British Consul at this port—now Sir William Lane Booker.

The Assurance Syndicate, which they represented, was the largest in the world. It included the Imperial, London, Northern, and Queen Insurance Companies. With about $40,000,000 cash assets to represent, Colonel Macdonald was enterprising, but, at the same time, so conservative that he was induced, after three years of astonishing success, to accept the agency of the Lion Insurance Co., Sir William L. having then departed for New York. Nothing succeeds like success, and it is not surprising that presently the agency for the Pacific Coast of the London and Lancashire Insurance Company was offered to Colonel Macdonald. The terms were so flattering that they were acceptable, and the headquarters of the London and Lancashire are now with Colonel Macdonald at 315 Montgomery street. Besides this, Colonel William Macdonald is at the head of our First Regiment in the National Guard, recently re-organized. It was such a victory for his friends that they have united in testifying their appreciation for his constant devotion to the interests of our State militia.

MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING, 222 Sansome St.

THE old year hid us farewell with smiles that were very beautiful, albeit rather frosty, and the new year dawned amid more smiles a bit warmer in quality. Let us hope it may be a harbinger of what is in store for us during the next twelve months. The holiday season has been a most pleasant one, and the prospects are excellent for a continuance of gay doings for several weeks to come. Christmas tree parties were very numerous this year, and not only that, but they were noted for their great brilliancy, the old folks as well as the youngsters participating in the frolics. Among the number were those at Frank Sullivan's, Ned Hopkins', J. D. Staples', and at the Bella Vista, and in each instance there were games and dancing and supper amid the pleasures of the evening. On Thursday evening Mrs. Thomas Jennings gave a dance for her daughter, Miss Addie Jennings, which was a delightful affair.

The closing events of Christmas week were the holiday cotillion of the Friday Fortnightly Club, which was led by Mr. Greenway, at Lunt's Hall; the Entre Nous Club dance in Maple Hall, where Mr. Lewald led the cotillion, with the assistance of Miss Lottie Musto, on Friday evening; and the dance of the Deux Temps Club, in Oakland, on Saturday evening, which several from this side of the bay attended.

The old year went out in a round of gay doings. The Monday Evening Club gave a dance at Golden Gate Hall on Monday night, and the same night Mrs. Roos gave a very large reception at her home on Post street, at which dancing was indulged in until far on towards morning and an elaborate supper served at midnight.

On Tuesday Miss Minnie Stubbs was the hostess of a large and elegant luncheon in honor of Miss Blackmore; the chosen hue for the table adornments, flowers, etc., was pink, and there were thirty-two young lady guests present.

Among the evening pleasures was a progressive euchre party given by Mrs. Catherwood-Darling in the Major's quarters at the Presidio, and Mrs. William Willis gave a large dinner party at her California street mansion.

Diversified in character and wide spread in locality were the festivities which marked the close of the old and the opening of the new year. Society in numbers betook themselves to Del Monte for the holiday festivities, which included dancing, driving, bathing, games, music, feasting, and a good time generally. Burlingame was in great form. The place itself was full to overflowing, and the house parties in the vicinity were almost as many as the habitations thereabouts.

At Mare Island the denizens of the Navy Yard gave a dance in the sail loft, which was attended by a number from town, while the city itself did not lack for parties to see the last of a year which had been one of such uninterrupted pleasure and merry-making. Large halls were given by the San Francisco Verein and the Concordia Clubs, and private gatherings were very numerous.

New Year's Day this year was quite reminiscent of the "calls" of former years, only that in this instance visitors were not restricted to the sterner sex as of yore. Mrs. Breeze gave a very large tea, at which a levy of the prettiest maidens of the swim assisted in doing the honors. The ladies of the Century Club kept open house at their rooms on Sutter street; Miss Beatrice Sachs gave a tea in the afternoon, which was followed by a dance in the evening; and among other diners was one given by Mrs. Hort at the Richelieu to the different members of her family.

The engagement is announced of Miss Grove A. Chittenden to Carl A. Windels. The wedding will take place in the near future.

Odd Fellows' Hall was the locale of the annual dance of the Terpsichorean Club on Thursday evening, which always takes place during the first week of the new year. Mrs. C. M. Dougherty and Miss Ada were "at home" last evening at their residence on Jackson street, and the second cotillion of the Friday Night Club came off at Odd Fellows' Hall; the Friday Night Club of Alameda also had their monthly dance last evening. To-night will take place the annual dinner dance at the Richelieu, to which Mrs. Levy requests that her guests ask their friends, and the result is a very delightful affair. The one which will take place to-night promises to eclipse its predecessors in size and elegance.

Mrs. J. H. Jewett is about to inaugurate a new idea in this part of the world for the entertainment of her friends. The first of these "recitals upon social life" will be held to-day at Mrs. Jewett's Bush street residence, when Miss Lillian O'Connell will, in costume, give a dramatic recitation entitled "Puritan Pictures." There will be two more—on the 18th, when the subject is to be "Through Colonial Doorways," and on the 25th, when "Maids and Matrons of the Revolution" will be the theme.

The Dannenbaum-Fletcher nuptials will take place on Monday evening next, and those of Miss Gertrude Naphthaly and Lionel Feigenbaum on Tuesday of the following week. The Walter-Mertiff marriage is set for the 21st, and will be celebrated upon a scale of great magnificence. The wedding of Miss Elsie Meyer and Abe Stern will take place in New York City next week, and their honeymoon trip is to be taken in this direction, as San Francisco is to be their future home. The wedding of Miss Kate Jarhoe and James Bull will also be among the January ceremonials, Mr. Bull having arrived from the East early in the week.

Theatre parties during the last two weeks have been noted not only for their number, but for their size, some of them taking up a large space in the auditorium. Among the givers were Dr. Tevis, Miss Marie Zane, Walter Hobart, Mrs. Ehrmann, Mrs. Schwabacher, Mrs. William Haas, Mrs. Collier, and Mrs. Hager.

Among recent dinner hostesses have been Miss Geuevive Goad, whose guest of honor was Miss Hyde, of New York; Miss Mary Kip, Mrs. Sachs, on Van Ness avenue, Mrs. Winsor Brown, Mrs. C. O. G. Miller, Mrs. I. W. Hellman, and Miss Rose Hooper, whose dinner was followed by a charming dance.

The Sphinx, of December 7th, a Cairo society journal says: Messrs. Albert G. Wieland, John F. Siebe, and Alexandre Lubin, round-the-world travelers from the States, have left the Continental, and started on their private dahabayah, "Marie Louise" for Luxor and Assouan.

Next Saturday night, January 11th, occurs the annual election of officers at the Union League Club. More than any one else General Dimond has been pressed for the Presidency, for many reasons, but especially because he has kept out of the Burns-Spreckels fight. So the members have agreed for the most part that, being on neutral ground, as it were, General Dimond, as the disinterested party, will bring peace and harmony into the League and make a first-class leader.

The Century Club's New Year's reception was a delightful affair at the club's rooms, 1215 Sutter street. There was a delicious eggnog, which was thoroughly appreciated; also an exhibition of artistic "Posters," which is now the latest "fad." Ludwig presided over the refreshments with his usual success, and what with the pretty decorations, and the ladies all in full dress, together with soft music from the orchestra, all went merry as a wedding.

Mrs. Rounsfield Wildman held an old-time New Year's reception at her home, 1515 Washington street, Wednesday. It was very popular with society, and the carriages came and went all day long. Of course there was a sumptuous repast which never failed.

The pretty holiday lunch of the Sketch Club was a novelty. The girls all dressed as peasants of various nationalities and brought Christmas presents, each and every one, which were finally heaped into a big sack and distributed "hit-and-miss."

Mrs. Louis H. Long, née Ermentrude Poole, has returned to her home in Los Angeles, to remain until April.

THOMAS RIORDAN.

ONE of the wittiest, quickest attorneys in legal circles is Thomas D. Riordan. His practice is confined to the higher courts, and his knowledge of international jurisprudence is so extensive that he frequently has been called into the councils of the most eminent statesmen. "As the secret of success is to succeed," said Thos. D. Riordan, the other day, "I will acknowledge that in the defense of Howell I enjoyed many difficult quarters of an hour!" Riordan is always witty, and his triumph in the acquittal of his client was really enjoyed more by his friends than by himself—just because he was so tired out over the constant and patient efforts which he had made in behalf of the man for whom he made so brave a defense. Mr. Riordan's association with such eminent counsellors as W. H. Choate and Wm. Evarts in national litigation won him sufficient congratulations to turn a young man's head. But the United States Courts here have given Attorney Riordan so many verdicts because of his ability to "charm a bird off a tree," that his success is always his success.

W. S. WOOD.

A GREAT winning lawyer is a rare personage, because to be really successful at all he has to be thorough. Mining laws are more complicated than any others, by reason of the technicalities involved. More especially so is this the fact on the Pacific Coast, and no one has done more to disentangle the great legal problems in the battles between giant rival corporations than W. S. Wood, of the law firm of Lloyd & Wood. Mr. Wood was born in Illinois, and came to California with his father in 1852, as a lad, taking up the practice of law. Mr. Wood was admitted to the Sacramento bar in 1863, and shortly after left for Nevada. For fourteen years he made a magnificent record as one of the leading mining attorneys in that State. Being associated at various eras with such powerful talent as that of Thomas Sutherland, C. J. Hillyer, B. C. Whitman, and Judge R. S. Mesick, there is no small wonder a man of young Wood's genius and ambition should succeed brilliantly, receiving the appointment of United States District Attorney for the State of Nevada. But he discovered in the year 1877 that there was a far wider field in California than that which he enjoyed in Virginia City, and consequently he resigned office in 1877 and came to San Francisco a short while after and opened his office. He entered into partnership with Reuben Lloyd, the well-known probate lawyer, and to-day the two gentlemen enjoy almost the largest practice on the Coast.

LAST Saturday inaugurated the season at Del Monte, and New Years Eve witnessed a grand banquet with a ball afterwards. The weather has been superb this winter, as usual, and one would think that early summer had arrived. Monterey is so sheltered from icy blasts of the North and East, that the proximity to the warm Japan Current which happens to cross the mouth of Monterey Bay, just at the right place, renders Del Monte the most ideal resort of the world. The Riviera in winter has its "mistral" from the frozen Alps to chill its visitors to their marrow-bones. But in our beautiful California sea-side resort there is always warmth, and coaching parties and out-of-door luncheons have been in order all the week. There is a delightful orchestra of picked musicians for the Saturday evening dancing, and Colouel Arnold, the manager, takes care to see that every guest has the most careful attention. The splendid Bathing Pavillion has been thrown open, too, and is as popular as ever.

CURIOUS PROPERTIES OF VIPER'S BLOOD.—Messrs. Phisalix and Bertrand, who have been studying the properties of viper's blood for some time, and who have discovered, as already reported in these columns, that it contains the same poisonous substance as the venom of the same reptile, gave an account of additional investigations before the Paris Academy of Sciences on November 18th. They had supposed that the viper, which resists inoculations of its own venom, did so because it was accustomed to this poison. But they now find in the blood, besides the poisonous substance, another substance that neutralizes the effect of the former. These two substances are destroyed by heat at different temperatures. The toxic substance disappears if the blood be kept at a temperature of 588 C. during a quarter of an hour, while the anti-toxic substance remains. If the blood thus heated be injected into a guinea-pig, not only does the animal not die, but it can endure an inoculation of fresh viper's blood.—Translated and Condensed for The Literary Digest.

FRUIT AS AN AID TO DIGESTION.—Science advises the use of fruit as an aid to digestion of other foods; such, for example, as apple-sauce, little sweetened, or, still better, sour apples baked; or for more developed digestive action the raw apple or other fruit. The mandate of science is that fruits should be used as an aid to digestion much more than they are now. The fruits supply acids which particularly assist the acids of the stomach. On the same ground, lemon-juice to help weak digestion. A great many persons who get up with bad feelings in the morning would find themselves cured if they regularly ate an apple with a slice of bread or other plain food a little while before bed-time.

THE PEANUT AS A FAT PRODUCER.—According to The Journal of Hygiene, consumptives have been recently treated by feeding them with peanuts, with very favorable results. The physician who used the treatment reports: "The peanut was long known as an excellent fat-producer and much more agreeable than rancid shark oil that oftentimes is sold for cod-liver oil. While not all can digest peanuts, a great many even with feeble digestion eat them without discomfort. It beats the Koch lymph and is the most satisfactory treatment I have ever tried for these diseases."

HEALTHFULNESS OF CRYING.—The disposition of the typical young lady to have "a good cry" seems to have been found physiologically proper. Medical authorities assert that crying is the best exercise for young children. One hospital superintendent says that a healthy baby should cry three or four times a day at least, and from ten to fifteen minutes at the time.

AN ELECTRIC PLOW.—A consular report from Leipzig gives interesting particulars of the use of an electric plow, not only in farming on a large scale but in small husbandry, and at the cost of $1.29 per acre against $2.74, the cost of doing the work with oxen. As compared with the expense of working the steam plow, the working expenses of the electric plow amount to less than one-half.

AN ECHO ORGAN.—Westminster Abbey has been supplied with an echo organ placed at a distance from the main organ, but so connected with it electrically as to make it as sensitive in responding to touch of the keys as is the main instrument.

The "Argonaut" is one of the most popular brands of Kentucky Bourbon Whiskeys, and one of the purest and best found in this market. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, where they are now located, are the agents for this excellent whiskey on the Pacific Coast, and are also the authorized agents for the celebrated J. F. Cutter Bourbon. The trade will make no mistake in buying the Argonaut brand.

THE difficulties of the English language are well illustrated in a story recently told of three French boys who were doing Shakespeare into English from their French versions. DEAR EDITH:—The review of a year of fashion finds us nearly where we were. Why and how Queen Marie Antoinette and the Princesse de Lamballe should have set such alluring fashions in the last century is natural, but the curious repetition of the present era is a social phenomenon.

Sleeves continue to be just as large as they were last year, and yet the capes, with their high collars, are thoroughly "Marie de Medici." Verily, women and their arts are a kaleidoscope! Also, they are full of anachronisms in their fashions. But then what do they care so long as they are attractive. I dare swear the ugliest styles ever introduced in the world's history were a beautiful surprise in the men's eyes. For it's all nonsense to say that women dress for women. They dress simply for men, and they know it.

But never have we had such an era of mad expense—brocades, figured velvets, rich fur trimmings, and, last of all, we've come to costly old lace.

Even the simplest New Year's gifts are not an exception to the rule. For instance, I saw a bonbonniere affair that was intended for a bride. It was a lace hammock, swung between two slender silver poles on a silver stand; the hammock was very dainty, and filled with the rarest of bonbons. It must have cost a cold fifty dollars. Then there was sent to a young woman at Stanford University an elaborate "mortar-board," trimmed with old lace! Fancy the sacrilege. It also was filled with sweets.

But lace has become so much a part of our being nowadays that it enters into every part of our domestic autonomy. Silk is used in petticoats, but no longer as underwear. The beautiful blonde on the "Hill" who recently brought back a dozen-dozen of black silk nightgowns, will weep to find that she should wear cambrie, nainsook, or dainty linen.

Nowadays a very pretty night gown is cut square in the neck in front, with deep sailor collar, striped with rows of insertion falling over the shoulders and ending on each side in a point at the waist. Lace drapery and ribbons of pink or green complete the picture. A straight full piece in front covers the bust, and is drawn in with ribbons. A row of lace frilled on trims the collar and extends below the points in front, half way down the skirt, which has a deep hem on the bottom, and two rows of lace insertion let in just above.

Another creation involves dainty nainsook with a round yoke, shirred slightly, the edge trimmed with a deep ruffle of nainsook and Valenciennes lace. A "watteau" in the back is gathered in, and falls from the edge of the yoke under the ruffle. Passing beneath it is a ribbon which binds the waist. The sleeves are very full and long, and the flowing cuffs are of lace.

Corset covers are another extravagance. They are built on an elaborate plan. Here is one—the latest. It is fitted to the figure in front by a succession of tucks reaching from the waist to the bust, from whence the fulness is drawn in around the shoulders. Two or three rows of insertion are let in, a narrow lace edges the top. For a bride, there must be loads of lace.

Tucked and lace-trimmed flounces laid over each other, and falling like cascades, are the latest idea. Usually they are made of fine nainsook and point de Paris lace. Also they are costly.

To calculate the expense of the female form divine, when fully clad to her heart's desire, this New Year's is a problem for the most anxious husband. Simplicity has been thrown to the winds, and the country had better hurry up and issue new bonds before all its money gives out.

CARCASSONNE.—BY JOHN R. THOMPSON

[FROM THE FRENCH OF GUSTAVE NADAUD.]

I'M growing old, I'm sixty years;
I've labored all my life in vain;
In all that time of hopes and fears
I've failed my dearest wish to gain.
I see full well that here below
Bliss unalloyed there is for none,
My prayer will ne'er fulfillment know—
I never have seen Carcassonne,
I never have seen Carcassonne!

You see the city from the hill,
It lies beyond the mountain blue,
And yet to reach it one must still Five long and weary leagues pursue;
And to return, as many more!

Ah! had the vintage plentiful grown!
The grape withheld its yellow store,
I shall not look on Carcassonne,
I shall not look on Carcassonne!

They tell me every day is there
Not more nor less than Sunday gay;
In shining robes and garments fair
The people walk upon their way.
One gazes there on castle walls,
As grand as those of Babylon,
A bishop and two generals!
I do not know fair Carcassonne,
I do not know fair Carcassonne!

The vicar's right; he says that we
Are ever wayward, weak and blind;
He tells us in his homily
Ambition ruins all mankind;
Yet could I there two days have spent,
While still the autumn sweetly shone,
Ah, me! I might have died content
When I had looked on Carcassonne,
When I had looked on Carcassonne!

Thy pardon, Father, I beseech,
In this my prayer, if I offend;
One something sees beyond his reach
From childhood to his journey's end.
My wife, our little boy Aignan,
Have traveled even to Narbonne;
My grandchild has seen Perpignan,
And I have not seen Carcassonne,
And I have not seen Carcassonne!

So crooned, one day, close by Limsux,
A peasant, double bent with age,
"Rise up, my friend," said I, "with you I'll go upon this pilgrimage."
We left next morning his abode,
But (Heaven forgive him!) half-way on
The old man died upon the road;
He never gazed on Carcassonne,
Each mortal has his Carcassonne!

THE Braverman case has interested a number of men who possess a small sum of money to lend. Isaac Kohn says that the pioneer jewelry merchant is not an insolvent debtor;—the suit involves fifty thousand dollars. Kohn says he lent this to Louis Braverman in various sums and at various times. For it he took the alleged mortgages on water front property. Now Mr. Kohn is out on the warpath to recover the earth if he can get it;—also he would like to have uncle Daniel Meyer involved—according to his complaint. And this, because Meyer happens to have a niece who got married once upon a time.

THE California missions have become the subject of romance, and the world is gradually beginning to realize that while our State has supplied the whole world with some billions of dollars in solid gold coin, it also possesses a grand story in itself—of the old Spanish days. The architecture was modest but beautiful, and now that it has been reproduced in a portfolio by L. Prang & Co., of Boston, whose agent, Mr. Dorety, 1230 Eight avenue, East Oakland, has introduced it here, doubtless many will frame the beautiful pictures—just to see them every day.

No visitor ever fails to visit the wonderful Japanese goods and cloisonné ware at Geo. T. Marsh & Co.'s, under the Palace Hotel.

A lamp with wrong chimney is like a man with another man's hat on—what is he good for?

Geo A Macbeth Co, Pittsburgh, will send you the "Index to Chimneys."

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

We always have time enough, if we will but use it aright.—Goethe.

A tyrant never tasteth of true friendship, nor of perfect liberty.—Diogenes.

There is no courage but in innocence; no constancy but in an honest cause.—Southern.

Theologies are well in their place, but repentance and love must come before all other experiences.—Beecher.

Of all our infirmities, vanity is the dearest to us; a man will starve his other vices to keep that alive.—Franklin.

The saddest failures in life are those that come from not putting forth the power and will to succeed.—E. P. Whipple.

When suffering has broken up the soil, and made the furrows soft, then can be implanted the hardy virtues which outbrave the storm.—Puncheon.

Few things are more important to a community than the health of its women. If strong is the frame of the mother, says a proverb, the son will give laws to the people.—T. W. Higginson.

No man can, for any considerable time, wear one face to himself and another to the multitude, without finally getting bewildered as to which is the true one.—Hawthorne.

Whatever can lead an intelligent being to the exercise or habit of mental enjoyment contributes more to his happiness than the highest sensual or mere bodily pleasures. The one feeds the soul, while the other, for the most part, only exhausts the frame, and too often injures the immortal part.—Anon.

In the schools of the wrestling master, when a boy falls he is bidden to get up again, and to go on wrestling day by day till he has acquired strength; and we must do the same, and not after one failure suffer ourselves to be swept along as by a torrent. You need but will, and it is done; but if you relax your efforts you will be ruined; for ruin and recovery are both from within.—Epictetus.

SAN FRANCISCO NEWS LETTER

California Advertiser.

Vol. LII.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1896.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT, 605-609-613 Merchant street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court, (Frank E. Harrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

OLD Mrs. Davidson is entitled to the thanks of this community for one thing. She has given us a rest from Durrant.

SOME good ideas were brought out at the session of the California State Teachers' Association in Oakland the other day. One of the instructors declared her conviction that children are sent to school at too early an age, and that too little attention is paid to their health. Another teacher called attention to the general neglect of sanitary regulations in the public schools, and formulated a series of rules as to light, ventilation and other matters of prime importance. It is refreshing to find that a growing sentiment exists as to the folly of cultivating the minds of children at the expense of their bodies.

INVENTOR Edison is confident that in the event of war with England, electricity would come into play as an important element for the defense of our coast cities. He says that many new sorts of torpedoes could be electrically managed and discharged under water, so as to sink whole fleets of war-ships that might venture into or near our ports. In fact, if Mr. Edison is to be believed, the navy that would dare to attack any of our great seaboard cities would be in danger of annihilation—after the electrical defenses were completed. But there's the rub: the ships might not wait until the electrical preparations had been finished. But if there's any merit in the great inventor's ideas, let the Government put them into operation at once.

WE may not all be rich, but as a people we are sometimes exasperatingly lucky. The extract of malt and hops, the risen lord of the English breweries, who has chosen our city as an arena to prove that he has a deal more money than brains, is reported as intending a visit to the cannibal islands. Let him not hesitate to go. The cannibals are said to be eaters of men, and it is possible they may mistake him for a man, if they shut their eyes and swallow him before they discover that he is only a flunkey. Gag him, that he may not speak, and disguise him as a decent brewer's son, and commend him prayerfully to the tender mercies of the man-eaters, scarcely nearer the original chimpanzee than himself. So may the Lord continue to him his only wise thought.

WE don't know whether the Rev. C. O. Brown has been guilty of a sin of the flesh, or not. So far as his fitness as a minister of God is concerned, it doesn't make much difference. If innocent, he has shown himself to be such an infinitely silly ass that no man, nor even woman, would tolerate him longer in the place to which a rather dull people have elevated him. If any man can show such incorrigible ignorance of the way to walk through this dark world, he could never attain the knowledge to guide the feet of innocence to the road that leads to God's country. The way thither is full of the obstructions of ignorance and sin, through the slough of despond, and up the hill of difficulty. And Brown—he seems utterly unable to find the way for himself, and he certainly cannot guide us, old sinners as we are, nor you, sweet maids, who wear the white robes of purity, with eyes upturned.

THE defeat of the old management of the Academy of Sciences, in the election of officers this week, infuses new blood and will tend greatly to enlarge the usefulness of the institution. It had long been a close corporation for Dr. Harkness and his satellites, but the public will henceforth take more interest in the Academy and its work. This institution should be conducted in a way to add something to the reputation of the city, but heretofore it has been rather more of a laughing stock than respected for its scientific achievements. With its magnificent endowment, the Academy should be conducted in a way to win distinction for the institution in the world of science.

BROTHER Bovard of Alameda, who had an alarming fit over the punch-bowl which the ladies that entertained Kate Field presented to the Press Club, has fallen down in another. The provocation to epilepsy this time are the orgies which his clairvoyant eye sees going on in the clubs of quiet and virtuous Alameda. It seems that the members of these monstrous associations, composed of reputable citizens, take a drink and play a game of cards when they feel like it. Even they invite ladies to witness their "high jinks" occasionally, and at these festivals the wive-cup actually is visible. When Brother Bovard has recovered, it would be an act of friendly reciprocity were the clubs of Alameda to request him to preach a sermon giving his views on the case of Brother Brown of San Francisco.

THIS is getting to be such a boisterously noisy world that one cannot peaceably retire into his own thoughts and indulge to his full extent in the sweetness of his native piety. The din of the drum and trumpet of the Salvation Army recalls us to the existence of sinners possibly worse than ourselves. Then comes a Presidential message sending out its flashes of American Monroe doctrine lightning, when there comes a crash of English thunder so quick thereon, that we are certain it must have struck somewhere. We have scarcely recovered our repose when Dr. Jameson and his filibuster crew begin to march on the Transvaal Republic, the Emperor of Germany pricks his ears, and asks Chamberlain what's up, and by the time the latter has solemnly declared that the British Government is not in it, President Krueger wires that the Republic is safe, William replies that he is glad, the whole English people are immediately mad, and there does seem as if there was going to be the very devil to pay.

THE clever forgery by which A. H. Holmes lightened the banking capital of this city to the extent of $20,000, by means of a raised check, has taught the bankers a lesson that they are not likely to soon forget. The moral of the affair is that reliance on mechanical devices to prevent forgery is altogether unsafe, since the work of these contrivances may be as cleverly imitated as handwriting itself. In fact, in this remarkable instance, the perforation of the paper, relied upon as a safeguard, was made the chief means of perpetrating a bold and brilliant fraud. But if any of these mechanical devices have merit, that which corrugates the whole length of the line on which the amount of the check is written is probably the most difficult to overcome. No matter, however, what sort of paper or instrument may be employed, there remains the necessity of great caution in the cashing of checks or drafts for large amounts, when presented by persons not thoroughly well-known or fully identified as trustworthy and responsible.

DR. BROWN AND HIS CHURCH.

THE attorneys of the Rev. Dr. Brown, in taking the stand that it is not he who is on trial for immorality, but Mrs. Davidson for blackmail, are unquestionably legally in the right, so far as the preliminary examination in the Police Court goes. And they may, with equal professional propriety, take the same stand when Mrs. Davidson is brought to trial in the Superior Court. By following this technical course Dr. Brown's attorneys will probably land Mrs. Davidson in San Quentin, but where will Dr. Brown be left? Where is he now? He set out to clear his character by causing the arrest of Mrs. Davidson. Then he insisted, through his attorneys, that as to the matter of her guilt or innocence of the charge of blackmail, "it makes no difference if Dr. Brown had improper relations with every woman in his congregation!"

Suppose Dr. Brown to be what his congregation thought him, a pure man terrified by a bad woman into paying hush-money rather than be the subject of a lying scandal, would he not at the first opportunity endeavor to prove his innocence? It was taken for granted that that was what Dr. Brown had Mrs. Davidson seized by the police for—that not the punishment of an obscure old woman, but his own vindication was his object. But immediately upon Mrs. Davidson's arrest things began to happen—the revelations as to the character of Miss Mattie Overman; the shelter of that person in Dr. Brown's own house; the retort of Mrs. Stockton to the affidavit of a disappeared lawyer that she had made indelicate advances to Dr. Brown; the statements by Mrs. Thurston and the Allens; the letters of Miss Overman to her friend, Mrs. Tunnell, disclosing her guilty relations with her pastor. Dr. Brown, when he arrested Mrs. Davidson, evidently was not prepared for this rain of accusations, of confirmation. In dragging Mrs. Davidson from her berth he awoke the whole sleeping-car. His retreat behind his attorneys and the intrenchments of technical law is understood.

There is speculation as to whether Dr. Brown will resign his pastorate or not. We do not think the First Congregational Church will permit him to resign. Our reason for so thinking is the assumption that the First Congregational Church is composed of decent people. If half of what is alleged against Dr. Brown be true, he is a lying, lecherous, hypocritical villain, whom to turn loose without branding would be a crime. We believe the church, which has been humiliated and disgraced, will see to it that he gets a fair trial before a court of its own, where the technicalities of secular tribunals will not be recognized, and that if found guilty he will be cast out with the mark of infamy upon him, so that it will be next to impossible for him to go anywhere else in the world and get a pulpit. Other clergymen have been guilty of conduct like that of Dr. Brown's, and yet have gone, under assumed names, to remote towns and villages and resumed their trade of preaching the gospel and their diversion of breaking the commandments. But Dr. Brown, if expelled by the First Congregational Church of San Francisco, will hardly be able to do this. His prominence as pastor of one of this city's leading churches, has given a national publicity to the scandal of which he is the degraded central figure. His portrait has been printed in every important newspaper of the United States. His face is in the rogues' gallery.

Churches always show loyalty to accused pastors, and are slow to believe ill of them. This loyalty often goes extraordinary lengths and provokes the jeers of the worldly, but the sentiment which evokes the loyalty is unselfish and admirable, and deserves the respect of every good man and woman. But when a pastor in whom a church has trusted drags himself and it with him into the mire, in the sight of the world, that church becomes stern and righteously resentful. It deals with him as an enemy of religion—the worst enemy. The people of the First Congregational Church are not, we should say, of the intellectual grade who will trust blindly in spite of damning evidence. They once before had an experience which teaches them that a man may preach well and seem to be earnest in his work, and yet in his private life be an abandoned scoundrel. Hence we believe the Rev. Dr. Brown will not be allowed to resign and slink off into the void, but that he will be tried by his church and compelled to bear the consequences of his acts, if they have been of the kind imputed to him by so many witnesses.

The Leaven of a New Idea.

THE NEWS LETTER is pleased to note that its suggestions as to the need of a Society for the Protection of Preachers are already bearing fruit. It is announced that a number of Oakland clergymen have taken steps to protect themselves from temptation and the wiles of blackmailers. The Rev. Marshall Law, according to the public prints, will henceforth receive no woman parishioner in the study at his church, unless she be accompanied by a male relative as a guarantee of strictly honorable intentions, and as a safeguard against scandal. The Rev. S. S. Palmer goes still farther in preventive measures, for he has closed his study in the church, and will from this time greet lady visitors at his home only, where Mrs. Palmer will be within call, and may at all times keep a watchful eye on suspects. From the observance of these precautions, it is but a step to the inception of the organization recommended and suggested by this journal. Ministers are but men, and the growing aggressiveness of what was once known as the weaker sex may well be regarded by the clergy with solicitude and alarm. Matrimony, it was at one time fondly believed, furnished a safeguard not only for clerical virtue but also against the tongue of scandal. But it now appears that even uxorious watchfulness and restraint is not always sufficient, either to keep ministerial footsteps within the safe and narrow path or to exclude meretricious attractions from their gaze. It is too much to expect that the wives of pastors shall be constantly on guard, and such extreme degree of conjugal care and espionage might awaken restlessness and a roving spirit in the most tranquil ministerial bosom. Hence arises the need of that organized care and guardianship; that sort of spiritual protectorate and moral suzerainty which has been advocated in these columns for the benefit of preachers. Whether the New Woman or the Old Woman is best fitted to grapple with this problem may be a question. It is not a thing to be treated lightly, but a real need of the hour. The clergy, as a body, must not be permitted or forced to retire entirely from intercourse with their fellow women, merely because the voice of scandal has been raised in the land. It may be that a plurality of wives for preachers, by multiplying the safeguards and the watchfulness, would be effective in one way, but there are insurmountable prejudices against a resort to this expedient. It appears to be well settled that clergymen must marry and must be monogamous, no matter how strongly a polyandrous inclination may be manifested among the weaker sisters of the flock, or among the tribe of New Women with advanced ideas and retrograde morals.

The Funding Bill in Congress.

ALMOST every material interest in this State is bound up, directly or indirectly, with the existence and successful operation of the great transcontinental railroad terminating in this city. To tie it up with foreclosure proceedings, or any other form of litigation, would be to paralyze every industry in the State. It is not thinkable that any wise or even thoughtful business men, not actuated by spiteful or malicious motives, can desire any suspension of, or serious interference with, the business of that road. It therefore goes without saying that no sane or fair-minded man can approve the extreme courses urged by Mayor Sutro and his committee of fifty. According to them the railroad, which is the helper and handmaid of almost every successful enterprise known to our coast, is to be ruthlessly treated as a public enemy, and brought to a condition of suspended animation. Whilst foreclosure procedures are had and new owners found ready and able to operate the road as it is now being operated, the iron horse must needs be tied up in the round house. For a time, at least—for litigation cannot be ended in an hour—traffic must be impeded, if not altogether suspended, and doubt and uncertainty attend every enterprise. And all this for what? Because the railroad is about to owe the Government a debt which it cannot for the moment pay. No railroad in this country or any other ever has earned and paid off its capital value within the short space of a quarter of a century. It would not inure to the progress and development of the country if so much were exacted. If fares and freights that only yield enough to pay interest on capital are complained of as being high, what would be said if they were raised so as to yield the principal as well as interest? The burden simply could not be borne, and that being so, the country under such a system would have been obliged to wait many long years for its railroads, and its development would probably have been put back a hundred years or more. The time to pay off principal is when the country, by the aid of the railroad, has sufficiently filled up to render the payment possible. Posterity, that will likely have even more use for the railroads than we have, may well share the cost of their having been provided. This generation is, in all conscience, doing enough. It is paying the cost of the Civil War and a vast sum in pensions. Moreover, it is paying interest on six billions ($6,000,000,000) of bonded indebtedness, incurred in giving the United States as many miles of railroad as are to be found in all the rest of the world put together. Without that expenditure this country could not be what it is to-day. Indeed, its unity could not have been preserved if its different parts had not been brought together in the manner they have. Who will say that that vast railroad indebtedness should be paid off at this time? The idea is absurd because of its impracticability. No one would care to seriously argue such a proposition. Yet it is on all fours with the proposal to require the Central Pacific to pay off the cost of its construction before it has had time to earn the money. What it is reasonable to require it to do might with equal justice be demanded by the creditors of all other roads. Why should the builders of the Central Pacific be treated with exceptional harshness? And why should the Pacific coast, which has benefited most by the railroad, be disinclined to grant an extension of time when nearly all the rest of the country acquiesces in its being granted? Besides, what better can be done? It is said that the Government can take the road and operate it. Who except a few cranks on this side of the continent believes that? How, when, and where has this Government, with its uncertain civil service, spoils system, and change of administrations, shown a capacity to handle such multifarious business interests as are involved in the management of this great railroad? Before so new and serious a departure as Government ownership is taken, the endorsement of the whole country should be obtained. Is it not safer and better, under proper conditions, to grant an extension of time?

The Wolves and the Shepherds. San Francisco is not the only hunting ground of blackmailers who aim at ministerial victims. A flagrant case has just come to light in New York, where the Rev. Aris Lichtenstein was the object of attack. The reverend gentleman is a Jew by birth, but some years ago became a convert to Christianity, and has since filled the pulpit of the Mariners' Temple, in New York. Not long ago he was decoyed to Philadelphia by a message to the effect that his sister was there seriously ill; but upon his arrival in the Quaker City he learned that she was in her usual good health. Later in the day a demand was made upon him for $5,000 by a young man unknown to him, who declared that the preacher would be put to a great deal of trouble if he did not comply. Subsequently a young woman appeared, who told Mr. Lichtenstein that he was the father of her child. This was news to the reverend gentleman, who had left a wife and children at his home in New York. He was at a loss what to do, but temporized with the blackmailers, and returned to New York, where he communicated with the police. Acting upon their advice, when an agent of the blackmailers next appeared, the preacher made an appointment, and some hours later he paid to three men a number of bank notes whose numbers had been noted by the police. Then officers who had been in concealment pounced upon the blackmailers, and they were lodged in jail. The reverend gentleman thinks that there were fully ten persons concerned in the plot against him. The moral of this occurrence is that persons called upon by blackmailers would do well to put themselves in communication with the police before paying any money or setting any sort of trap for the schemers. The affair also shows that a cautious man, who has no secrets to conceal, need not fear attacks of this character. But the innocent and the guilty should alike beware of setting secret traps for blackmailers, lest the result be to catch their own feet. The time to call in the police is before, and not after, the payment of hush money.

Labor Its Own Oppressor.

Eugene Debs is not the first agitator who has been transformed into a philosopher by a term of imprisonment. He who threw the whole country into commotion by leading the great railroad strike of 1894 now announces that he has had enough of strikes, and advises the workmen to go into politics for the relief of grievances. "I will," he says, "never hereafter accept any position in a labor organization; I will under no circumstances, be allied with any trades union. I expect to work for all labor, and urge the necessity of workmen seeking their emancipation by the ballot." To this end Debs will publish a paper. Just how the workmen are to emancipate themselves he frankly confesses that he does not know, but he leans strongly to the belief that it will be through socialism.

Though Debs has turned philosopher, it has not yet broken upon him even dimly why it is that the workmen, who could be omnipotent at the polls because of their numbers, are so feeble there. The reason is that the workmen mistake their position utterly in the United States. They have fallen under the illusion that they are oppressed by others, when, as a matter of fact, they are their own oppressors. If they would free themselves from the notion that they are victims of a designing minority, and realize that they are equal citizens of the republic, who have the power to correct unjust social conditions, they would be on the right road. But they prefer to consider themselves as a class apart, with special rights, including that of levying domestic war for the increase of their wages; and, so long as that continues to be the case, they will remain hostile in interest to every other class of citizens, who, in self-defense, will band against them.

It is want of brains that keeps the workman down. He is too vain to admit this, and call in to his help men of better intellect than himself. Until he ceases to be suspicious of sympathizers who do not possess the supreme virtue of working with their hands for a living, he will stay where he is—at the bottom of the heap. Intelligence will continue to rule whether the workman likes it or not, and intelligence knows that the worst thing which could happen for labor, and everybody else, would be to let labor, in its present stage of mental development, get on top. A class of men who admit that they do not know how to use the ballot for their own betterment thereby confess that they are unfit to be trusted with political power. To make friends with intelligence, not to be at surly and threatening enmity with it, that is the true and only path open to labor. Its "emancipation" lies with itself. We commend this thought to Mr. Debs for consideration in the paper he is to publish for the enlightenment of the world.

Letting Down the Legal Bars.

It is reported that all of the class of sixty-four law students, who recently underwent "examination" at the hands of the Supreme Court Commissioners, were admitted to practice. If this be correct, it appears that the change authorized by the last Legislature, by which the Justices have turned over the periodical "examination" to the Commissioners, is not of a character to raise the standard of legal acquirements. The practical working of the new method seems to be to let down the bars to all-comers. It is scarcely conceivable that in a class of sixty-four applicants, all could be found qualified for the practice of law. Of late years the number of lawyers has so greatly multiplied in this city, through the medium of the law colleges, that the wonder is how such a multitude contrive to eke out a living. Perhaps the increase is not actually so large as might appear from the results of the periodical examinations, as it is probable that a large proportion of those licensed to wrangle at the bar ultimately take up blacksmithing or some other useful handicraft, or engage in commercial business. At all events it is safe to say that the majority of attorneys in San Francisco, capable or otherwise, earn no such income as the fancy of youthful aspirants to forensic honors paints in glowing colors. The abundant pecuniary success of a score or two of prominent lawyers is by no means the real standard of professional income. But whenever the newspaper print a story of large fees paid in some important case, involving great pecuniary interests, the ambition of a hundred young men is fired with the desire to likewise win fame and fortune at the bar. At the present time, it is no doubt safe to say that the best advice to those about to study law is that proverbially offered by Punch to those about to marry—"Don't." If fitness and a creditable desire to master the intricacies of the law were allowed to regulate the supply of attorneys and counsellors, the profession would never be overcrowded, and it would be to a great extent relieved from the too-common bad practices which have of late years steadily lowered its standing in this community. The growth of the commercial spirit in this calling, once justly honored as of the noblest to which the intellect of man could devote itself, is as conspicuous as it is deplorable. Not the best lawyer, but the most crafty business man, is he who wins, as a rule, the greatest pecuniary rewards in law practice. What San Francisco needs, and the whole State, for that matter, is not more lawyers or other professional men, but more manufacturers and producers; more men who create business and furnish employment for labor, and fewer of the classes who strive to win a more or less precarious support by their wits.

Will He Never Cease From Troubling? It was hoped when the new School Board was elected, more than a year ago, that ex-President Hyde had ceased to vex the School Department with his arbitrary and dictatorial meddling. But he is one of those men who seem never to know when to retire gracefully from a public station. He had made himself so generally and so cordially detested by the teachers and their friends that his re-election would have been an impossibility, under any circumstances, and a less thick-skinned man would have been content to leave the schools to the direction and control of the new administration of the department. But Mr. Hyde's invincible desire to rule had to be gratified in some way. So, as Superintendent Babcock has explained, he wined and dined the late Grand Jury, and so cajoled them into the adoption of certain recommendations relative to the conduct of School Board matters. In these recommendations the hand of their author is unmistakably revealed. It seems not to have occurred to Mr. Hyde that the province of the Grand Jury is not to lay down rules for the guidance of the School Board. The Grand Jury might with equal propriety undertake to tell the Board of Supervisors how to transact their business, or formulate a system of rules for the Mayor in the affairs of his office. As Superintendent Babcock and Director Hawley have shown, the present School Board compares very favorably in respect to economy and efficiency with the board bossed by Mr. Hyde. In fact, the Superintendent, who is in a position to judge, declares that the present is a much superior body to that which revolved about ex-President Hyde. The charge of the Grand Jury, that the present board has raised the salaries of substitute teachers, is certainly not of a very grave character, in view of the general sentiment that the teachers should be well paid, but it is altogether lacking in fact. The new Board has merely restored some salaries that the Hyde-bound Board had unjustly and unreasonably cut down. The present Board has by resolution called upon the new Grand Jury for a hearing in relation to the criticisms which the last Grand Jury was deceived into adopting, and, while the subject seems to be outside the proper limit of the investigations of this inquisitorial body, it is no more than fair, in view of the circumstances, that the request be granted and the whole matter fully explained.

Keen Interest in Foreign Affairs. Not for many years have foreign affairs excited so large a degree of attention in America as at the present time. The Nicaragua question, the dispute about the Alaskan boundary, and the grave difficulty that has arisen over the Venezuelan matter are of themselves sufficient to occupy no small share of the thoughts of our people. But these are, for the time being, at least, cast in the background by the progress of the Cuban rebellion and the serious prospect of war between European powers because of the disturbances in the Transvaal. The prophets of peace, who, a few years ago, seemed to have things all their own way, now stand aghast at the fierce spirit that has blazed out between England and Germany. It is clear that a very little thing would suffice to provoke war between these two great powers—two of the most Christian nations, alike distinguished for progress in the arts and sciences, in philosophy and literature. After all civilization is but a thin veneer, spread over the inherent savagery and ferocity of human nature. The brutal instincts of humanity crop out more conspicuously and with less restraint in the intercourse and the quarrels of nations than in the private dealings of individuals. The ruling class of Englishmen, as individuals, would not be guilty of the crimes against liberty which have disgraced the Government of Great Britain from the earliest times down to the present day. Her claims in Africa, and especially her assumption of a so-called protectorate over the Boers, are not founded upon any natural right, but merely upon military achievement. It is true that the Transvaal republic acknowledged, by treaty, the assertion of British authority, but it is justly claimed that the armed invasion by Dr. Jameson and his following of filibusters has abrogated all treaty rights.

Naturally, the people of this country sympathize with the Cubans in their struggle for independence, and with the Boers in their manful and stalwart determination to resist British encroachment. What the English have attempted in the Transvaal they would do to-morrow in Venezuela, were it not for the certainty that the United States would come to the rescue of the republic whose soil would thus be invaded. While in Europe there is no international doctrine corresponding to that formulated by President Monroe, there is a keen international jealousy which likewise serves to protect the weak from invasion or attack. Thus Germany is quick to resent the inexcusable invasion of the Boers' territory by an armed force of Englishmen. The German Emperor evidently believes, despite official disavowals from the British authorities, that some secret understanding prompted Jameson's march toward Johannesburg. The situation looks threatening, and perhaps England has not much reason to hope that Germany will allow her to gracefully retire from an awkward dilemma. When England's pride is thoroughly aroused, there is small room to doubt that she will prefer fight to national humiliation, no matter what the cost. But many a serious diplomatic complication in Europe has been relieved ere this without bloodshed, and it is not unlikely that this whole trouble in the Transvaal will blow over without warfare between the great nations concerned.

Polygamy in Utah State. It is remarked in some quarters that the nation has taken Utah at her word in admitting her as a State on her promise that polygamy shall never again be permitted within her borders. The Examiner declares that while the constitution of the new State prohibits plural marriages, the people of Utah may by amendment strike out this provision at any time. But it is to be remembered that the prohibition of polygamy, irrevocably, was required by the Act of Congress in accordance with which Utah was admitted to the Union, and is also one of the conditions of admission expressed in the proclamation of President Cleveland declaring Utah to be a State. While no such question has, perhaps, ever before arisen in this country, it seems highly probable that the Supreme Court of the United States would hold the prohibition of polygamy to be an element of the contract or covenant into which the people of Utah have entered, and that any amendment to the State constitution, removing this prohibition, would be null and void. It is not to be supposed that a Territory may obtain admission to the Union upon certain express terms, and subsequently, at pleasure, avoid the conditions of the compact.

Peace and joy are synonymous, we are really very happy indeed on this New Year's day, for the racket is denfening and has been ever since ten o'clock last night, when the tin horn peddlers, selling those ear-splitting constructions at a profit of four cents on each, began laying the foundations of their fortunes. The street in front of old Trinity was blocked by an immense throng, many people having come in from out of town to listen to the New Year's chimes, but, alas! it was little they heard of the chimes, so deafening was the blare of the tin trumpets, and I fancy the bell ringer is the only person who can conscientiously say that he heard the lovely music. Old Trinity was very beautiful and picturesque in the clean, cold moonlight, and even the tombstones were lighted up cheerfully in the old churchyard where the earliest colonists of Manhattan have slumbered so long. It was curious to notice last night how all the crowd gazed up at the belfry tower, as if they could hear the music with their eyes. The chimes rang "Evening Bells," a selection from "Oberon," "Massa's in the Cold, Cold Ground," which the multitude supplemented with a vocal chorus, "Happy New Year to all," and half a dozen other selections. Up in Grace Church tower the chimes were also rung, and there the music was of a less secular character than at Trinity. At St. Andrew's, in Harlem, there were more chimes and more people, and a spirit of gayety pervaded the city.

"Punch bowls," as New Year's eve parties are now called, were very much a feature last night, and as for the theatres you simply could not get inside the doors. To-day an old custom is being revived at the City Hall, where the Mayor and the City Fathers will receive from noon until four o'clock. Several artists have announced their intention of spending an old-time New Year's and keeping "open house," and one of our Californian dames, Mrs. Harry Gillig, is doing the same thing quite informally to-day. It is a pity that such a pretty custom should ever have fallen into disuse, although it was surely impossible to continue it once it became so sadly abused.

The Music Hall managers had a nervous shock early in the week when the order was sent out from police headquarters that no more intoxicating drinks should be served in places of amusement. This was a hard hit at Koster & Bial's, the Olympia, the Imperial, Miner's Bowery Theatre and that mild place of amusement, the Eden Musée. A test case was made at once, and a mighty sigh of relief rose to the clouds when the judicial decision was sent forth that the law forbidding such sales was a dead letter. I suppose the next thing to be organized here will be the formation of a County Council, such as exists in London, to enforce what an individual I know insists on calling the "exercise law."

I have several times lately run across Jack Klein—"Klein of Samoa," who is now a valued member of the Herald staff. He is as full of energy and brain as ever, and apparently devoted to his work. Charles F. Brandenstein and L. Levy, of San Francisco, have been guests at the Windsor this week, and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Osborne, of Los Angeles, are at the Holland. Mrs. Sime, who has been at the Empire ever since her return from New London, intends starting for California within a few weeks on a visit to her sons.

The sensation of the day is the Burden diamond robbery. Mrs. Burden is a leader in New York society, and is a beautiful and brilliant woman. Mrs. Burden is a cousin of Henry Burden McDowell, whose mother was a Miss Burden. The family fortunes are derived from the great Burden Iron Works at Troy. The diamonds stolen represent a value of about sixty thousand dollars, and after almost a week of investigation the police are still in the dark as to the thief or thieves. At present suspicion points to some servant, but it is cruel to designate before one can assert. Robberies are very frequent all over the city, and it is said that the departure of Inspector Byrnes has given courage to many sneak thieves who "lay low" during his régime.

Oliver H. P. Noyes has just arrived in New York, and has abandoned his idea of a European trip for this year. Mr. and Mrs. Kesick, of Yokohama, both well known in San Francisco, are at the Windsor with their children, maid, governess, and the baby's ayah, who is a source of intense interest and excitement all along the Avenue whenever she takes her baby for an airing.

A disastrous fire occurred last night in Westchester, when the di Zerega homestead, with all its valuable paintings and tapestries, was destroyed, five paintings worth five thousand dollars each being consumed. The di Zeregas are an old and honored family here, some of whose members have visited California. One of them, Lady Frankland, was, I think, in California on her marriage journey. PASSE-PARTOUT.

HOW AN ORIOLE MURDERED HER FAMILY.

It has been claimed by observers that some of the feathered tribe will feed their young if they are caged, and if they fail after a certain time to release them they will bring them a poisoned weed to eat that death may end their captivity. About a week ago, at the Holstein ranch, says the Carson Appeal, the children captured a nest of three young orioles, and they were immediately caged and hung in a tree. The mother was soon about, calling her young, and in a little while brought them some worms. She continued feeding them regularly for some days without seeming to pay much attention to persons about. But on Sunday came the tragic ending that demonstrated the theory relative to birds. She brought them a sprig of green on Sunday morning and disappeared. In less than an hour they all died. The sprig was examined and proved to be the deadly larkspur, a weed that will kill full grown cattle. The little creatures lay dead in the cage and slightly foaming at the mouth, victims of their mother's stern resolve that her offspring should die by her own act rather than live in captivity.

"How did you get Borely out of your whist club—did you ask him to resign?" "No; we didn't like to do that, but we all resigned except Borely, and then we all got together and formed a new club?"—Harper's Bazar.

germ=life

The doctors tell us, now-a-days, that disease germs are everywhere; in the air, in the water, in our food, clothes, money; that they get into our bodies, live there, thrive and grow, if they find anything to thrive on.

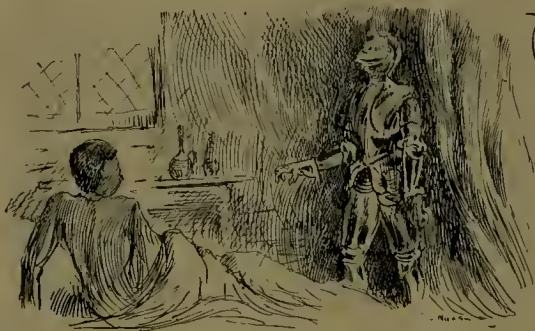

Consumption is the destruction of lung-tissue by germs where the lung is too weak to conquer them. The remedy is strength—vital force.

Scott's Emulsion, with hypophosphites, means the adjustment of lung strength to overcome germ-life. It is fighting the germ with the odds in our favor. These tiny little drops of fat-food make their way into the system and re-fresh and re-invigorate it. Whether you succeed with it or not depends on how good a start the germs had, and how carefully you can live. The shortest way to health is the patient one. The gain is often slow.

What Became of the Ghost.

W. L. Alden.
Yule Tide

SIMMONS was an excessive and unnecessary American. That was the unanimous verdict which his fellow artists passed upon him when he made his first appearance in Paris.

"Probably you don't believe in ghosts," said Simmons. But if you'd known as many ghosts as I've known, you'd understand that ghosts are as common as cats, and pretty near as intelligent.

"Two years ago I was painting in Venice, which I consider the meanest town on this side of the Atlantic, and I can't say worse than that. It's ruinous and dirty, and inconvenient, and you can't get anything fit to eat in the whole place. It has the biggest ghost population of any city in the world, though the general public doesn't know it. You see, the cemetery is mighty uncomfortable, there being at least a foot of water in every grave, and the consequence is that most of the people that are buried in Venice prefer to become ghosts and wander around the town, where they can manage to keep dry. I was wanting to paint a picture on the Northern Lagoon, and one day when I was looking for a good place to set up my easel, I saw a house standing just on the edge of the water, that looked as if it had been shut up since the time of Julius Caesar. I saw that if I had a room in that house I could paint my picture without any interruption, and so I made inquiries about it. Well, I found somebody who professed to be the agent of the owner of the house, and I rented a room for three francs a month.

"I soon found that the house was a regular ghost barrack. They didn't show themselves, but they made a lot of noise. There wasn't any lock to my room, and the first night I slept in it the ghosts opened the door, and let in a current of air that gave me a cold; so I put a cheap lock on the door, which kept out the ghosts, though any ordinary burglar could have opened it with a nail. Sometimes the ghosts would come into my room while I was at work; but beyond making the furniture creak, and occasionally knocking something off the table—for they are a careless lot—they didn't disturb me in the daytime. But at night there seemed to be whole gangs of them going up and down stairs, and holding political meetings and women's rights conventions in the next room. Every now and then I used to get up and go out on the landing and ask them to remember that they were keeping an inoffensive foreigner awake.

"One day I went to the bank to draw some money that was coming to me from America, and to cash a draft for a picture that I had sold to an English tourist. Altogether it made a good bit of money, and the banker paid it to me in gold, because I never trust any of this foreign paper money. It filled a small bag, and as it was too heavy for me to carry in my pocket, I carried it in my hand, though the banker warned me that I was putting temptation in the way of the poor, and trifling with the feelings of the criminal classes. I had my dinner at a restaurant, and afterwards spent most of the evening at a café in the Piazza, where I used to go to read the papers. About nine o'clock I heard thunder, and, not having any umbrella, started in a hurry for my room.

"The storm came up more slowly than I had expected, but soon after I had gone to bed it arrived, and gave a first-class exhibition of what Venice can do in the line of thunderstorms when she gives her whole mind to it. It rained as if the water had been emptied out of a thousand washtubs; the lightning was so sharp that it half blinded me, and the thunder shook the whole house from top to bottom. As for the wind, it howled worse than a London milkman; and as there was too much noise for sleeping, I just lay in bed and amused myself watching the lightning. All at once I saw something that I don't mind admitting gave me a start. I told you that King Arthur, as I used to call my suit of armour, always stood in a corner of the room. Well, I happened to be looking in that direction, when a flash of lightning showed me that King Arthur had moved about two feet away from the corner, and was standing perfectly still in his new position. I didn't mind ordinary ghosts; but when it came to a suit of armour waltzing around a room by itself, I didn't like the look of it. I lay there in the dark, trying to persuade myself that I had been mistaken in thinking that I had seen the armour standing in the corner when I went to bed, and saying to myself that the woman who took care of the room must have moved it. I knew all the time that this wasn't true; but when a man is fool enough to be frightened at a ghost, he is always fool enough to believe any moderate lie. But by-and-by there came another flash, and I saw that the figure had moved a couple of feet farther along the wall, and had one hand stretched out, as if it was feeling its way in the darkness. Now I knew what was the matter. Some ghost had got into that suit of armour, and was walking around in it.

"Probably the ghost that was inside of the armour found it difficult to walk in such a heavy suit of clothes. At any rate, he moved about as slow as a district messenger boy; and if you know anything about district messenger boys in London, you know how slow that is. The next flash showed that the figure had left the wall along which it had been sliding, and was coming straight towards the bed. It was only about fifteen feet from me, and my heart began to beat at the rate of about a hundred and fifty to the minute.

"However, my fright didn't last many minutes. I reflected that a weak ghost in a heavy suit of armour would be about as useless for fighting purposes as a professional pugilist who is in the habit of writing to the newspapers. I made up my mind that I would wait till the figure was close to my bed, and that I would then jump on it and upset it on the floor, the chances being that I would have plenty of time to find the matches before the figure could get on its legs again. I gathered myself together for a spring, and waited till—according to my calculation—King Arthur was within striking distance. Then I threw back the bedclothes, and made a jump for my visitor. I struck him good and square, and we both came down with as much rattle and clatter and bang as if we had been a dozen lengths of stove pipe.

"I stood for a moment wondering what I had better do with my visitor, just to teach him a useful lesson, when I happened to think of a stick of solder that I had bought one day when I wanted to mend several cracks in the breastplate of King Arthur. I lit my spirit lamp, heated my soldering-iron, and laying King Arthur in a handy position on his back, began to solder the different pieces of his armour together. I soldered his front and back plates till nothing less than a cold chisel could have unbuttoned them; I soldered his helmet tight to his shoulders, and I soldered his leg-pieces from the hip down to the foot. I worked over the job for a full hour, and when I had got through I had made him pretty near watertight.

"Now, my ghostly friend," I said, "this will teach you not to come into a gentleman's bedroom and take liberties with his curiosities. You've put yourself into that suit of armour without leave, and you'll stay in it till I'm ready to let you out, which won't be for some time. I'll just tie your legs to the bedpost, so that you can't shuffle away before morning, and then I'll make up some of the sleep that you've deprived me of with your foolish and indecent games."

"Well, I tied the figure's legs to the bedpost, and then I blew out the candle and went to bed again. When I woke up in the morning it was broad daylight, and the storm was over. I looked over the side of the bed to see how King Arthur was getting on, and I never was more surprised in my life than I was to find that he had gone. I jumped up and looked under the bed, that being the only place of concealment in the room, but my friend wasn't there. The door was locked as usual, and the key was under my pillow. It was clear that King Arthur must have gone out by way of the window, and then I noticed that one of the front windows that looked out on the lagoon was partly open. I went and looked out of it, but there was no figure in armour in sight. The tide was unusually high—higher, in fact, than I had ever seen it before. Not a soul was stirring at that early hour, and after wondering what could possibly have become of my suit of armour and its wearer, I went back to bed for another nap."

Simmons paused for a moment, and we all thought that he had finished his story. I was just about to ask him what his explanation of the walking suit of armour was, when he resumed.

"Do any of you fellows read Italian?"

We all assured him that we did not.

"Then," said he, taking a newspaper cutting from his pocket-book, "I'll translate a little paragraph that appeared in the Adriatico—the Venetian paper—ten days or so after my experience with King Arthur. Listen to this:—'Yesterday morning two fishermen, Carlo Farbis and Antonio Seamozi, made a discovery of the most horrible in the Canal of Burano. Seeing something shining under the water at low tide, they arrived to bring it to the surface. It was a complete suit of armour of the fifteenth century. In addition to being fastened in the usual way, the armour was soldered together, and when the fishermen had prized the visor of the helmet open, they were filled with horror to find that the corpse of a man, in an advanced state of decomposition, was enclosed in the armour. Evidently one treats of an atrocious murder, and the police are soon to make an important arrest.'"

We all agreed that Simmons's adventure was a remarkable one, and nobody ventured to express any doubts as to its literal truth. Simmons was hardly the sort of man with whom to discuss a question of veracity. But after Simmons had gone home, and left us still at the dinner-table, the man who had been sitting next to him picked up from the floor the newspaper cutting which Simmons had translated. It had been cut from Galignani's Messenger, and not from an Italian paper; and instead of referring to a gruesome discovery by Venetian fishermen, it simply contained the hours of the departure of trains from Paris to London.

THE COST OF TUNNELS.

IN comparing the four great tunnels of the world there is seen to be a very remarkable decrease in time and cost of the successive works. The Hoosac tunnel, the oldest of the four, cost $379 a foot; the Mont Cenis, the next in date, cost $356 a foot; the St. Gothard cost $229 a foot; and the Arlberg, the latest in date, cost only 154 dol. a foot. This rapid decrease in cost, within comparatively few years, is a marked indication of the great progress in mechanical methods and improvement in rock-excavating tools. A still more striking result exists in the case of a tunnel through the Cascade, on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. This, unlike those named, which were excavated in old settled countries, the terminal easy of access, was in a peculiarly difficult location, so much so that it took six months to convey the machinery to the spot. Rivers had to be turned aside, bridges built, and material transported over improvised roads through nearly one hundred miles of forest, mud, and snow-fields, yet the tunnel, which is 16½ feet wide, 22 feet high, and 8,950 feet long, was bored through the mountains in twenty-two months, at the rate of 413 feet a month, and a cost of the completed tunnel of only $118 a foot.—Information.

"We Obey No Wand but Pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

IT is a poor season that does not bring us several editions of that superb tragedy by James Sheridan Knowles, Virginius. Its subtle blending of the tragic and the poetic, the delicate fancy of its sentiment and the rugged potency of its awful strife have long ago given it a place among the classics. Louis James, one of the most versatile of American tragedians, chose this old favorite for the opening of his engagement at the California. The performance, while not developing any special distinction for the supporting company, was interesting and even, and staged with taste and discretion. Mr. James' portrayal of Virginius was strong and conscientious. He invested Virginius with all the devoted tenderness that the Roman felt for his motherless girl, displaying a deeply human emotion and caressing gentleness that have not been so marked in his former work. As Virginius, the avenger, the fierce breadth of passion, the boundless virility of the actor were put in splendid play. Over all was the guidance of an acutely keen intellect. Miss Alina Kruger impersonated Virginia in a shy, girlish manner, brimful of youth, and not without a sweet charm in the face of rather an over-conscious presence. Ililius was a bit too musical to impress one with his sincerity; Mr. Lindsley's elocution is too saccharine to be manly, no matter how ardently he loves. William Harris, as Appius Claudius, and Harry Langdon, as Deutatus, were moderately good.

On Wednesday evening Mr. James gave Hamlet. It is with pardonable trepidation that one sits as an auditor to new lips in this most profound and complex character in the English drama, and more particularly was it so when Mr. James' press Mercury had announced the presentation as one radical and startling—the happy ambiguity of which expression was not fully appreciated until the final curtain had precluded the possibility of any seriously disenchanting innovations. Mr. James' Hamlet is admirable for its ingenuous perspicuity: a Hamlet intelligibly and methodically mad, not madly equivocal. After the ghost's visitation, from the first reply to Horatio's eager questioning, Mr. James clearly defines his Hamlet; the mistrustful glances at Marcellus that accompany the meaningless words are ostensibly the inspiration of his derangement. As a whole the Hamlet of Louis James is an earnest, able performance. In the present dearth of geniuses it is from such talented and studious players as he that we must receive the immortal tragedies. In the fury of the last act, in the wild burst of grief at Ophelia's grave and in the closing of the second act, Mr. James gives us a living, breathing Hamlet, a Hamlet even reconciled with our fondest memories of the part. In the soliloquy and in the scene with the queen, that indefinable something, that magnetism, dominative genius, or whatever be it that compels a hearing from the very soul, is not to be found. It is beyond the limit of Mr. James' temperament. He does his best; and it is the best that we have seen since Edwin Booth.

Miss Kruger's Ophelia was most prominent in the support. Girlish and immature, yet a long remove from crude, Miss Kruger played her part with surprising nicety of perception. Mr. Lindsley's version of Laertes was intensely operative. The remainder of the cast was satisfactorily but uneventfully filled.

Marie Wainwright, an established star, an agreeable exponent of many standard and classic characters—in fact, a woman who has fed upon the best that the drama affords—presented at the Baldwin Theatre on Monday night, The Daughters of Eve, a four-act society play by A. E. Lancaster and Julian Magnus. In spite of the presumable authenticity of its authorship, and the suggestion of merit that Miss Wainwright's adoption of the piece would signify, I am inclined to believe that The Daughters of Eve was snatched warm and bleeding from the columns of the Fireside Companion, and that the Lancaster-Magnus brand is but a touch of local color. (Mr. Magnus, if I correctly remember, once acted in a managerial capacity for Miss Wainwright). Old students of the Fireside Companion—and they were many before Mr. Bok and his "Heart to Heart Talks to Young Men About Pajamas" swooped down on literary America—will perceive in Rhoda Dentry, the self-same young woman who, through scores of prurient intrigues and cases of bubbling wine, set their febrile pulses fluttering so intoxicatingly in the days gone by. Rhoda was bad, always. Sometimes the man with the tall hat and the cigarette made her so by that vague process known as leading astray; at others she seemed, like Topsy, to have "just growed" that way. But she was a deuce of a girl at all events, redolent of sensuous perfumes, always smartly gowned and bestocked in the gauziest of silks. And she invariably fell heels-over-head in love with the hero—a love unreciprocated, and finally dispatched by prussic acid or entombed in a nunnery.

Our Rhoda of the present week is no innovation. She meets Robert Hawthorne, the hero, at a ball in the upper tenderloin, whither he has been wafted by a most weird and uncanny jag, and, after her escort has felled Robert by a well-delivered and resounding right-hander, she has him carried to her apartments where she nurses him back into condition, and then, that she may longer retain the man she loves, chloroforms him—a form of oblivion that makes Robert the envy of the audience. Rhoda has a twin sister, Grace by name—a good, beautiful, sad-eyed girl, and the beloved of Robert. She quarrels with Robert, and sends him out again into the wild, sinful world he had forsworn for her sake. The final scene is Rhoda's apartments. Robert has, in a measure, recovered from the knock-out, the jag, and the chloroform. Rhoda is stricken with a violent change of heart; she implores forgiveness for the wrong she has done Robert and her sister, and takes her broken heart and her battered reputation off to the convent, which, fortunately coincident with her resolution, is within a stone's throw of her rooms. Just in time her exit, for ere another minute the good sister Grace enters and takes her wandering boy back to her heart. The calcium gleams; the stained glass windows of the convent are luminous in the background. The organ throbs faintly in the distance the pæon of a saved soul, and the curtain descends on two foud hearts united. Shades of Laura Jean Libbey, it is harrowing!

The Daughters of Eve is another sociological study induced by long confinement in fourth-rate boarding houses. The serious lines are a blend of verbosity and paresis, the comedy would wring a heart of marble. "He's a good policeman—always on the beat," followed up by a stage-full of delirious laughter. That is a gem specimen of the wit that sparkles in the ball-room scene. The one glowing spot in the entire play is the slogging feat in this same act—but what a pity its possibilities are limited to two characters.

Miss Wainwright plays Grace and Rhoda, and, despite the girls being twins and counterparts of one another, contrives to give a definite identity to each role. Her essay in a modern society drama is unfortunate only in the choice of the play. Nathaniel Hartwig burlesques the drunken business, and maims several opportunities by over-posing and over-acting. His mental anguish takes the most grotesque methods of physical demonstration. Barton Hill makes the most of a dignified and ungrateful part. If the authors intended Mrs. Dobbs to be a howling idiot and a towzled frump, and they evidently did, Miss Russell's version is quite successful.

Society drama at the Baldwin, tragedy at the California, comedy, variety, and music at the other houses, it was timely for the Frawley Company to open their season at the Columbia with a strong, sensational play. The Lost Paradise combines sensationalism with brains in such a dexterous way as to make a drama that will appeal to the thoughtful theatre-goer as well as to the masses. It handles the labor question in a forcible and inoffensive manner, and, like The Ensign, displays the ability of the Frawley players for melodramatic, as well as comedy work. Mr. Frawley's tour has done him a world of good, if one may judge from the life and action he put into the young superintendent. Maelyn Arbuckle, always a painstaking, reliable actor, made a strong character of Andrew Knowlton, the owner of the iron works. Ralph Standish was the conventional villain in the hands of Eugene Moore, and Bob Appleton was made delightfully jovial by George Leslie. Miss Jennie Kennark, returned to the Frawley fold, played Margaret, the mill owner's daughter, with taste and feeling. Miss Archer and Miss Bates set aside their smart gowns for the once, and played Nell and Cinders, girls from the works. Miss Archer's Nell, pale, pitiable, and feeble, was excellently sustained; Cinders was a revelation in modern toughness. In fact, Phosa McAllister, Hope Ross, H. D. Blakemore, Charles King, and all the members of this popular organization were there, conscientious as ever in their work, and seemingly glad to be in their home theatre again.

My Precious Baby, at the Alcazar, proves to be a refreshingly brisk piece of French comedy, worked into clever English lines, and well produced by Mr. Grover's company. Leonard Grover, Jr., plays the boy who, up to his twenty-first year, has been chained to his mommer's apron string. These slender chains give way at last, and the youngster well makes up for the time lost. Young Grover infuses great mirth and devilry into the lad, and makes of him an excellent comedy character, vivacious and gingery, and productive of no end of amusement for the audience. The company gives its accustomed strong support.

A vigorous old piece of melo-drama is The Fugitive, and a splendid presentation has it enjoyed this week at the Grand. Like hundreds of other pieces of the same character, its theme is rewarded virtue and punished crime, and Mr. Morosco's actors, with their wonted skill in this line of work, have brought out all the fire and excitement that are in the play. Next week Sedly Brown's comedy-drama, A Long Lane, will be produced with the entire strength of the company.

At the Baldwin, Monday night, Marie Wainwright will begin her final week with Sheridan Knowles' famous old comedy, The Love Chase. Her impersonation of Constance in this piece was received with much favor in New York. The Love Chase holds the boards until Friday night, when Camille will be presented and repeated at the Saturday matinee. Tom Taylor's comedy, An Unequal Match will be given on Saturday and Sunday nights.

Next week the Frawley Company will present at the Columbia their great success of last season, The Senator. Mr. Arbuckle's Senator Rivers, Mr. Frawley's Lieutenant Schuyler, Mr. Blakemore's Ling Cling, and Miss Bates' Mrs. Hillary are too famous here to need more than an announcement of their repetition.

Louis James' second and last week at the California will see that favorite actor in four different characters. Monday and Thursday, Percy Sage's dramatization of Scott's Marmion; Tuesday, Othello; Wednesday and Sunday, Macbeth; Friday and Saturday matinee, Romeo and Juliet, and Saturday night, Hamlet.

It is not generally known that Mr. Adolph Bauer, the musical director of the Tivoli, is a very talented pianist. Mr. Bauer was for four years solo pianist with Wilhelmj, Sarsarte, and Camillo Urso. He will give two Chopin recitals on Sundays, January 19th and 26th, at the St. Nicholas Hotel.

A host of new attractions, besides several of the old favorites, have been on the Orpheum's bill for this week. Miss Huth's negro dialect songs have caught the town. She is one of the cleverest women that have ever appeared at the Orpheum—and that is saying a great deal.

IXION continues to crowd the Tivoli seven nights a week. The new edition introduces many clever songs, dances, and other specialties, and bids fair to keep the holiday attraction going for several weeks to come.

THANK heaven, the City Hall is going to be finished, not just yet, but some time later. Just now it is the dome that wants a few more nails, and the contractors have turned expanders, and have asked to have their contract expanded. So, two to one of the City Hall Commission, ninety days have been added on account of hard times. Let us be patient. Broderick, the Auditor, heard the cry of the distressed habel builders, and approved. The Mayor played the part of a Christian for the nonce, and said: Amen, so be it. Creswell insisted upon the pound of flesh, but was outvoted. So the City Hall is doomed to be domed some day.

When the dome on the City Hall is finished there is to be placed upon its apex a statue of Liberty. There is some doubt as to who will lift it to its place, the contractors who haven't finished the dome declaring that they draw a line at putting it up, it not being a part of the dome, and the statue builder declaring his work done when the statue is finished and laid within reach of the derrick. Representing Liberty herself, the City Government itself, or anybody who really loves Liberty and his native land will be at liberty to finish the job.

As a statue of Liberty on the City Hall, when it shall get there, that new statue will mean more liberty than any other statue of the kind in the world. It will be symbolic of the free and easy way in which we do things here and hereabouts. It will suggest not only liberty, but it will hint of the liberties we take with the very spirit of Liberty. It will tell not only of political freedom, but also of all the kinds of freedom there are in the matter-of-fact world, and also in the world of the imagination. It will lift its hand over the municipal government, and suggest the liberties its officers take with the municipal treasury. It will seem to preside over the courts of law, where the estates of the dead are distributed with a liberty unsuspected by the late lamented, and where matrimonial cages are opened to let loose the birds who find that liberty the sweetest which is earliest hought. It will seem to utter benedictions on the churches of the land, in which the people are free to worship God, and the ministers are free to worship the devil. But this is a rather unhappy theme, as the prospect opens, and so we shall take the liberty to forbear writing farther of the thing which everybody knows is the dearest thing on earth, but is every where treated as the cheapest, and is so shamefully abused that the very spirit of Liberty seems like a very devil, and makes most decent people wish in their hearts that Liberty herself were dead, and past resurrection.

The "tall man" and the "short man" into the firm took
One day, as a co-partner, the glib-tongued "Eastern crook,"
And since that hour, when citizens are stopped upon the road,
The "tall man" and the "short man" are said to be abroad;
And when a hank cashier is robbed the robber wore the look
The victimized at once declared of that bad "Eastern crook,"
But odd, it seems, in all the course of crimes, unvaried round
The "short man," nor the "tall man," nor "Eastern crook," are found.

So then, perforce, we must assume those merry knaves can grow
From tall to short, from crooked to straight, and the detectives throw Off all pursuit, yet 'tis but fair to give the rogues their due,
Although they ever dodge arrest, they always "leave a clue."

Douglas Tilden, the sculptor, who so unfortunately is deaf and dumb, is at the same time serenely happy. His appreciation of his own success and plastic genius are exalted by his expected nuptials in Oakland. But the other night he dined with Willis Polk and John Stanton in the California Hotel. Stanton told a lot of funny stories and amused the waiters vastly. They—to the number of three—for it was late—congregated about the table to hear the "Café noir fairy-tales."

Of course Douglas Tilden could neither speak nor hear. But all the same he smiled and beamed and hasked, in the presence of so much attention. At last he wrote on a card to Stanton:

"How in the world, did these men find out who I am!"

All of which reminds one of dear old Oliver Goldsmith at Sir Joshua Reynolds' dinner, when Garrick turned to him and said severely:

"Dr. Goldsmith, I saw you at the docks to-day, witnessing the arrival of a lot of painted ladies from Flanders; and, sir, I was astonished to hear you murmur to yourself: 'Why does all this crowd gape at these gaudy Jezabels, when the author of the 'Vicar of Wakefield' is among them!'"

Goldsmith blushed till his cheeks were scarlet, and answered: "Why Garrick, I know I was thinking that all the time; but I wasn't aware that I said it aloud!"

However, Tilden can be frequently amusing, unconsciously as ever of course. The world at large is well aware that a bas-relief, or a basso-relievo or whatever they call it in art, is a sculpture which stands slightly forth from the plane on which it is formed.

When Mr. Tilden recently made his celebrated kick about the quarters assigned to the Bas-Relief students in the Hopkins' Institute he observed that "the worst of it is, the men have not room to move about. They are expected to do bas-reliefs without moving around, which every modeler knows is impossible."

Pray does Mr. Tilden make his own bas-reliefs round or square, that he has no room to circumvent them! or does he call his statues bas-reliefs?

[After a little while, during which he (Dr. Brown) expressed himself in a very emphatic way, he said: "This evening I shall lecture, and trust you will appear at the meeting." The subject was "A Pale Horse."—Extract from Mrs. Davidson's testimony.]

The things which happened yesterday,

Oft come to pass again,

The rain succeeds the sunshine,

And the sunshine follows rain:

And so 'tis not surprising

But just the same old course,

Doc Brown left Mattie, rufy haired,

To preach on the "White Horse."

George T. Knox, the notary, whose ability as a raconteur is no less admirable than his wisdom as a notary, was husily engaged after New Year's Day taking "swear off" affidavits. Among those who forswore allegiance to the inspiring cup was the "short-bit capitalist," a prominent citizen who has earned this sobriquet from his custom of always paying, in a Montgomery street saloon, for his solitary drink with a short bit. He took the usual oath, and when the document was handed to him for examination, said:

"But, Colonel Knox, you have omitted an important clause."

"What is that?" inquired the notary, slightly nettled at this imputation on his accuracy.

"On my own account, sir," rejoined the wealthy hihulant, "I swear off on my own account. But I have said nothing about drinking on the account of others."

The all-important addition was made, and the capitalist departed with his "swear off," to look for a victim.

That wild snorter of the Alameda prairies, Dr. Bovard, is again blowing through his fiery nostrils wrathful gusts at all cluhs, as being conducive to knocking the pins from under Christianity.

Bovine Bovard's loud hellowings would fill a rotten tub,

The cluh to suit this orator should be a loaded cluh,

A cluh well charged with common sense on his gray matter falling,

The wholesome lesson might impart to cease his silly bawling.

The constitution of our mental and moral being is such that in order to preserve a vital equipoise we have to cherish in our community not only eloquent and somewhat moral ministers, but also statesmen whose record can be read by any one with half an eye, with that kind of pride that satisfies one's whole moral appetite. Now, there's that great and good man, late the Congressman from the Stockton district to the Congress of the United States, more recently Governor of the State. He has always been great. When he was born, the scales indicated fourteen pounds, of which about seven pounds were cheek, and the rest cerebral gray matter in which thoughts are spontaneously generated. When the Examiner was collecting the dying words of the statesmen of California on the subject of the Funding Bill, the Governor, with his fingers in the armholes of his vest, and half of his eye bent upon the record of his past greatness, read aloud to the enquirer the few eloquent words in which, when he was a mere babe in the science of statesmanship, he pioneered the way to the Government ownership of the trunk line between here and yonder. If the Governor hadn't been a great man from the start, he would have been obliged to formulate an answer to the inquiry instantaneously. As it was, ipse dixit—he had said it. He was then a statesman in the Bud. He is now a Budd in statesmanship—the Gubernatorial chair—and loves to read aloud the record of his precocity. Later will he not be a Buddd in the Senate; then, maybe, swell into a Budddd in the Presidential chair? We imagine that will be considerably later. Such examples of early greatness are rare, but California runs to large developments, and we have to have them.

The lion may a twist endure of his prehensile tail,
May growl at Venezuela, and scout the Clan-na-Gael,
To Russia smiling say, "Dear Bear, old Turkey is no loss for us,
"Be good, we'll give you elbow room, perhaps, upon the Bosphorus;"
But when young German Billy cries, "come here and see the fly on
"The tawny and much battered hide of this voracious lion,"
The beast doth howl, the war foam flies from out his clashing jaws,
He bellows "Billy, take it back or else you'll feel my claws."

Jeremiah Lynch told a funny tale at the Bohemian Club the other night about a friend of his who is a prominent street contractor. This individual, it seems, was holding forth at great length on the problem of Great Britain's woes.

"The Napolyon av' Yurup is, Queen Victoria!" said the Contractor to his admiring friends; "She's filled full av' liquor and ambition. It ain't the English what wants to war, they all av' thim know they're scared. But Queen Victoria she wants to be ould Queen Elizabeth all over agin. She's deep—that ould woman!—and she want's to be queen av' all creation!"

Poor, tired old Queen Victoria!—Ambitious at her age!—That's all one may say.

Cupid and Hymen for some weeks have scowled at one another. The men of law who tie the knot had caused them so much bother; Groezinger collared all the fees for splicing happy couples, and squeezed them till the eagle screamed between his hawny knuckles;

Now Kerrigan is at the hat, and at cut rates will tie men
To those they love, so Cupid drinks again with merry Hymen.

A NEW shoe is a problem. Most people dread the ordcal of "breaking them in." But when one can go to P. F. McNulty's, 139 Post street, and secure shoes that one may wear with perfect ease and entire comfort from the first moment they are placed on the feet it is serene enjoyment. In fact, corns are unknown to them. But at the same time they are thoroughly fashionable. The most "swagger" set in town goes to no one else except McNulty, and the fashionable clubmen are universally his patrons.

THE Regeneration of Remorse.—Every time a man be-thinks himself that he is not walking in the light, that he has been forgetting himself and must repent, that he has been asleep and must awake, that he has been letting his garments trail and must gird up the loins of his mind—every time this takes place there is a resurrection in the world.—George MacDonald.

The remainder of the entire stock and beautiful fixtures of Colonel A. Andrews' Splendid Diamond Palace is now up for a final auction sale. There have been some magnificent bargains realized there this week during the sales—which by the way, continue from half-past ten in the morning till late in the afternoon. Colonel Andrews has been noted for years as the best judge of precious stones on this continent, and some of the finest gems in his collection are still to be had.

AMONG the many resolutions sure to be made in the opening of the New Year, it is said, the following old sayings will fit admirably several of our society beaux. One gallant soldier is quoted as advising a certain pretty bud not to be so fickle and uncertain, reminding her that "a rolling stone will never gather Moss." Another, a young man of millions, is pondering over the axiom, "it is well to be off with the old love before one is on with the new." Another is: they say, considering the idea of having an ode written to the old missionary hymn tune to be sung by the guests at his next supper: "To Greenway's ice-cream function we've come a happy band." Yet another is said to be determined on making his best girl Winn, mothers-in-law to the contrary notwithstanding. An old soldier is credited with saying it is considered fine to be an old man's Darling, but it isn't in it with being an old woman's.

It is funny to listen to a bevy of girls commenting upon the different steps and styles of dancing of the men who are their partners at cotillions. This is about what they say: Wilcox has a loose sort of roll; Maus glides beautifully; Davis is sentimental in his way of holding his partner; Southard Hoffman prances; Addy Mizner is jerky; Summerall is too lovely for anything; Morton Gibbons keeps perfect time; Ed, Greenway is so fat he has to bold your waist at arm's length; Al. Bowie's step is slow and graceful; Tom Van Ness has a hop, skip and jump style; Willis Polk is slouchy; Winston holds a girl splendidly, he's so tall; Joyes, on the contrary, is sort of afraid to "brace up" his right arm to a stiff tension; Tara McGrew dances all over his partner's toes.

A rumor is afloat in the swagger exclusive B'lingham set that it is meditated by the powers that be in that favored spot to have a society circus. Now, what special form this species of amusement is going to be is what is provoking curiosity in the swim. Society is known to indulge in many a pastime which can appropriately be called a "circus," yet no ring nor clown is appended. Again, a ring and clown in society often produce a decided circus in themselves. The gossip of the hour is that a bona fide old time circus is what is meant in this case, however; and Hobart, Baldwin, Clifton, Tobin, in fact, all the sports of that select settlement are to take part. On dit, Jack Casserley will do an act on stilts, and Carey Friedlander a feat never yet equaled.

The result of such esclandres as the Brown-Davidson affair is nowhere more apparent than in the attitude observed by our men—particularly the old ones—toward the naughty fair sex. No more doth the fascinating typewriter cast her wiles with success. A cold wave now takes the place of the affectionate, fatherly interest of yore of her employer, and the confidential stenographer is now relegated to an outer office. It is amusing to note the difference of the late afternoon car passengers. The men are all busy with their papers now, and do not cast even a glance in the direction of the ogling feminine who sits near

There is some talk of an army and navy ball to be given before Lent. The army does more than its share of entertaining, and the women should show their appreciation of it by taking a little extra trouble in going out to the Presidio hops, even though the night be dark and chilly. A big ball in which the navy unites is sure to draw a large crowd, and already the buds are planning fresh gowns for the occasion.

If Dame Rumor speaks by the card, one of the sweetest as well as fairest belles has been captured by a young society beau. At any rate the probabilities are so discussed, and it has made a breeze in society's drawing-rooms, of late.

Talbot Clifton is said to be in a state of huge disgust over the report that a charming bud of the season has got "the whip hand" of the leader in horsey doings at B'lingham. GREETING.

To all my friends and acquaintances New Year's greeting.

At the same time I take this opportunity to extend to the music loving public as well as to the representative press of San Francisco, my sincerest thanks for all the many marks of appreciation and encouragement shown me during my recent stay in their midst.

New York, Dec. 27, 1895.

THE death of Robert George, of Sausalito, will be greatly deplored in Marin County. His prominent business and social position and the invaluable services which he performed in behalf of the beautiful little town in which he resided render his loss a public calamity there. For fifteen years he had been the secretary of the Sausalito Land and Ferry Company, and, in that capacity, he was largely instrumental in the splendid improvements which have marked its rapid progress. Mr. George was born in Baltimore seventy years ago, and leaves a wife and five children.

During the recent war-talk in London, it seems that the Music Halls have revived the famous old "Champagne Charley" song, with its patriotic touch and its celebrated Moet & Chandon refrain.

After dinner try Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum. You will find it admirable.

The New Creamerie.

YOUNG & WEISEMAN'S POPULAR ESTABLISHMENT STILL GAINING A DESERVED REPUTATION.

The New Creamerie, at 725 Market street, has since its founding been a place of resort for the most particular of San Francisco's epicures. A first-class service, aided by an extremely low scale of prices, has been influential in establishing the reputation of this famous house, but these have been well hacked up by the many original ideas advanced and by the high quality of the food furnished, and, in spite of its competitors' jealousy, the Creamerie continues to hold a foremost place among San Francisco's restaurants. All the butter, eggs, milk, cream, and vegetables used on its tables are all produced at the ranch of the proprietors, which guarantees their purity and freshness. Special attention is given to the bread and pastry used, everything in this line being baked on the premises and under the eye of the proprietors, while the coffee is a special feature which alone would serve to make the place popular. Delightful string music is one of the features.

A Sunday "Table d'Hôte" dinner, the price of which is only 50 cents and which will outclass any dinner served in the city, is a new addition to the attractions of the New Creamerie.

confidence which this branch of our municipal government have in his integrity and sagacity.

Mr. Scott's nominating speech expressed the situation when he said: "I think that, without regard to politics, under the present government, the members of this Board have been treated very fairly. The rulings have always been just, and, remembering the old adage that it is poor policy to swap horses in the middle of the stream, I therefore nominate Mr. Dodge for this Board for another year."

The result was entirely favorable to Mr. Dodge, of course, although he was himself a warm adherent for the election of Mr. C. A. Murdock. Mr. Dodge has held distinguished official positions during his long career on the Pacific Coast, but he is doing magnificent service nowadays.

AN ILL WIND.

CURSE the luck!"

The milkman gave a vicious tug at the pump handle and jumped into his wagon. Giving vent to his spite by whipping his horse unmercifully, he sped down the road, leaving the air blue behind him.

For years he had left home every morning before day-break with his cans half filled with milk. These he stocked up with water from the old pump and then proceeded to serve his customers. For the first time in his career as a purveyor of pure milk from his own dairy, the pump had failed him. Somebody had broken the handle.

It was too late to return home, and he hadn't the nerve to borrow any water from his neighbors, hardened though he was.

In the midst of his reflections, he was accosted by a stranger, who ordered him to stop, at the same time displaying a State Dairy Inspector's badge. With a much better grace than the official had expected, the milkman pulled up his horse and uncovered the cans for inspection. The result was a complete surprise to the man with the badge. He was utterly dumbfounded. For the first time in his life all the milk he tested was absolutely pure.

The news spread far and wide. Soon the milkman had not a single rival left in the place. The monopoly made him rich, and everywhere he went he was proudly pointed out as the one honest milkman.

The Pommery Sec Stakes.

In the race last Saturday at the Bay District track, for the Pommery Sec stakes, the time was 1:39¼, beating the former Coast record, which was 1:40. This remarkable time suggests a parallel. The noble horse which sped over the track, and won honor, knew not that the prize raced for bore a name which is held in high honor by all the aristocratic epicures in the Old World and this. The man who drinks Pommery wins sound health, a clear mind, a wholesome and even temper, and a broad and sunny view of humanity. If he is going the pace, Pommery Sec restores his health, invigorates his palate, and comes to him an angel of recuperation, enveloped in a garment of sparkling wine. The course of life, like the course the horse speeds over, gains additional value when the stakes are of such wide import.

Major McLaughlin's Recent Retirement.

The scurvy treatment Major Frank McLaughlin received from a portion of the press of this city on the eve of his retirement from the active management of the mines on the Feather river, near Oroville, was just about what might be expected in a quarter where the worst construction is put on everything, no matter whether it be right or wrong. In the desire to say a few little mean and nasty things, the fact was overlooked entirely that McLaughlin has been the means of bringing some millions of money into the State. A very large proportion of this money was paid out for labor, putting bread into the mouths of families which would otherwise have experienced the pangs of poverty during the hard times which have borne so heavily on the working classes for some years past. No mention was of course made of this or many other benefits which the State has derived one way and another from the inauguration of an enterprise which has no equal in modern times from an engineering standpoint. It is this same mean and carping disposition which has done so much to hurt the State abroad. No matter how promising an enterprise may be, nor how faithfully it is conducted, the small-souled individual who is always with us, is sure to find some basis for an underhand attack. This reputation has hurt California abroad more than might be believed, especially in cases where men less favorably situated than Major McLaughlin are unable to defend themselves. The English investors in the Feather River mines have nothing but the kindest feelings toward the man who, ever watchful of their interests, has devoted years of his life to the work on their property. During the entire seven years which Major McLaughlin has devoted to the management of this stupendous enterprise not a dollar has been paid to him as salary. He simply stood on a level with other shareholders in the division of any profits which have accrued, but, in addition, gave up his time, and supplied the brains and energy to execute a work of such magnitude and character. Without McLaughlin, the snow-fed torrents of the turbulent Feather would still be dashing in heavy volume over the massive boulders which mark its course through mountain gorges, instead of flowing peacefully under control as it does now; elevated many feet above its ancient bed, and, without a McLaughlin, the object of this herculean task will never be attained. It is pleasant to be in a position to authoritatively assure the malignants, so grievously exercised over Major McLaughlin's relations with his recent associates in the Golden Gate and Golden Feather Companies, of Loudon, that they continue as friendly as of old, mingled with a sincere regret that his decision is unalterable in regard to retirement from the position of general manager, in which, from first to last, he has earned the most flattering encomiums from shareholders both large and small.

The San Francisco Stock Exchange. On Monday next the annual election of the San Francisco Stock Exchange will take place, and in view of the important changes inaugurated, involving the listing of a new class of mines, it is one of the most important which has ever taken place. For the executive position of President Mr. Joseph Marks and Mr. Gurnett have been nominated. In Mr. Marks the nominating committee has made a most happy choice. He is in every respect a true representative of the typical broker, brainy and energetic, with a reputation which has never yet been questioned. He is just the man required now to put the Board where it belongs among the leading institutions of this city. Confining his business strictly to the commission branch, his sympathies would naturally be with the meow on the floor, while experience has taught him the line of duty, but for the development of the business and the general prosperity of the Exchange. Active and popular with all who are brought in contact with him, he is in every sense a representative man, who will reflect credit upon the Board no matter in what position he may be placed. The members cannot too highly appreciate a man of his character, and in honoring him they are honoring themselves. There is little doubt that Mr. Marks will be elected and his entry into office will signalize a new and brighter era for the Exchange, which includes many worthy and honorable men among its membership. The San Francisco Stock Exchange is worthy of more recognition than it receives just now from the public of this city, but the election of such men as Marks, a man above suspicion, will go a great way in building up confidence among outside investors. While the companies, be they on the Comstock or off it, listed on the Board can expect fair play under the Marks regime, we will venture to say that they will be kept under better control and in a truer line of conduct than they ever have been when other men have been in power, whose only claim on the office was an untoward display of an inimical feeling to the so-called "insiders." The other offices will be filled by the present able and courteous incumbents, many of whom have done faithful yeoman's service in the Board.

California Gold Mines Are Booming. The citizen that is not interested in a gold mine now is not in it, and the chances are that he will come a cropper later on in trying to head the procession of coming millionaires with a blind jump. The small people have now got hold of the line, and prospects are in demand. The big fish can have their going concerns for all the public cares at this end of the world. A story is now going the rounds of a young fellow working in a Market street pharmacy for a pittance, who got a relative to grub stake him on a prospecting tour. After hard work he managed to strike it up in Nevada County, and has now a little ledge opened up from which he is taking out $1500 a month. The shortage of water in the mountains is being felt in this city now, although, perhaps, it may not be yet perceptible to some people who have forgotten that there is such a thing as a mine in California. At least one and one-half millions of dollars in gold has been tied up in the mountains by the failure of the water supply, which would have, otherwise, come into town. A falling off of gold shipments to this extent must, necessarily, make itself felt in commercial circles.

The Alaska Mill To Start Up. In the Alaska mine the Grizzly tunnel has been run in 165 feet, and good ore has been found for a considerable distance back from the face. Of the forty stamps already in place, twenty have been repaired and are ready to drop next week when milling will begin. The improvements which have been already made to this plant are of such a substantial nature that the mill is even better than it was when first erected. Mr. Randolph Payne arrived in town a few days ago, but will return to the property as soon as possible. We have nothing to say, but to reiterate that this mine, under proper management, will turn out to be one of the best purchases ever made by the English investor on this Coast.

Comstock Mining Shares. No new feature developed in the mining market on Pine street during the week. The news from the mines continues favorable, but the speculative voice is unresponsive. Possibly after the gold mines make their appearance in the Board there will be an incentive to get in and do some rustling. As it is, the public can hardly be blamed for not standing in. There are no chances to make a turn at a profit worth taking a risk upon, and this is at the bottom of the dull times on the street.

United States Gold Yield. From figures received the director of the mint estimates the total gold output of the United States at about $47,000,000. During the past year California produced $15,600,000 in gold and 154,700 ounces of silver. Nevada produced $1,700,000 in gold, and 622,000 ounces of silver. California's gold production is larger than that of any other State, Colorado coming next with $15,000,000 worth.

Mining Schools. The proposition to devote twenty-five per cent. of all money paid to the United States by each of the States for mineral lands for the maintenance of schools of mines in each of said States, will be hailed with satisfaction by the mining community at large. The passage of the bill by Congress will be the death-knell of impostors now masquerading as mining experts.

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil's air, with you."

IF the 'Town Crier' should get on his horse and ride furiously to every corner, and call out the names of those who should be earliest held up to public execration, this man W. H. V. Raymond, who ignorantly and unblushingly degrades the title of Professor, would hear the syllables of his name. As an employé of the State Government, it has been his duty to revise the State school books. He has considered his chief duty to be the drawing of his monthly stipend of $250. Instead of revising the old grammar, he has virtually confessed his inability to understand what the word "revise" means, and a like inability to devise a grammar. He has, accordingly, employed a couple of girls, who know more grammar in a minute than he ever knew, to write a spick and span new grammar at $150 per month each. He has explained to the Governor that he was, meanwhile, spending his time in the more arduous task of using his scissors and pasting scraps together for a new reader. We commend this highly honest educator to the attention of the people, that he may be taught a lesson in each of those studies, grammar and reading. Let him learn the difference between the present and the past tense, as expressed in the sentence: Professor Raymond was in the employ of the State, instead of is in that employ. That will teach him also how easy it is, by a new method, to read a knave out of office. As to the girls, whose grammar is said to be such as will beget a mental chaos in the minds of all pupils, they may be well satisfied that they have easily accomplished the dread result that all the grammarians from away back have succeeded in doing.

THE town of Truckee, which up to date has been more noted for its vigilance organization, known as "The '601," than for efforts of an æsthetic nature, has this season distinguished itself by the construction of a so-called "ice palace." The people of Truckee have at their command all the frigidity required to make the enterprise a success, and by a free use of water and hose have contrived to completely cover a circular wooden rink with a glittering coating of ice, outside and in. Then there is a toboggan slide, as an additional attraction, and all the residents of the sunny valleys and of the towns and cities by the sea have been invited to take a trip to the lumber town high up in the Sierra and experience a little of what is called "old-fashioned fun." Much of this hilarity is of the marrow-freezing and tooth-chattering order, but for those who enjoy a temperature of zero or thereabouts there is much in this festival at Truckee to repay a journey over the Summit in Midwinter. Before the close of the ice carnival, the historic "601" may find occasion for a manifestation of its old-time skill with the tar bucket, and this consideration adds a "special inducement" to the "occasion."

NOW since Ingersoll has withstood the concerted onslaught of prayer, what do the pious conspirators infer? That their appeal was too quietly made and, therefore, was not heard, or that high Heaven was busy caring for the unambitious and the humble? It strikes us, as would a sledge-bammer, that the Christian Endeavorers should not try heaven so much after the manner of the rain-makers, nor suppose that prayer is like a swarm of bees to be "settled" by the noise of a beaten tin pan. It is possible that Ingersoll is not as important in the eyes of God as he is in the gaze of Christians whose eyes are dazzled by the false flash of his rhetoric. If orthodoxy be true, it may be that the Lord is willing to let Ingersoll go for the retributive benefit of the lost; or, being most merciful, He may let him go below to cheer the melancholy set.

THAT the British lion has a tail is known to every American patriot, and on this side of the world it has come to be believed that the tail was made to be twisted. But it seems not. When other than a cousinly hand gave it a turn in Berlin last week, the show of teeth and the roar of the venerable beast astonished our jingoes. There is blood in the old lion, and fight, too, as Emperor William is evidently realizing.

SAN FRANCISCO is never likely to be forgotten if the world wants something particularly vile and nasty to talk about. Nation may clash against nation, and all the international heavens be smotheringly dark with war clouds, but we invariably take some such occasion to let the world know we are up to some deeds of such monstrous wickedness that we cannot hear the roar of other people for the very din we are making ourselves. We are positively a mighty bad lot, and when the ministers put on an especially sanctimonious look and ask each other to join in prayer, they can't help laughing. It is certain that if things go on much longer, we shall have to stop attending prayer meetings, and instead of putting our nickels into the contribution box, shall have to divert them to the new slot machines, which will be soon made to toss out a card on which the name of the next long shot will be expressed in ciphers known only by ourselves.

SPEAKING of Dr. Brown, the spiritual adviser of the Reverend Sam Mayer's congregation, the Presbyterian vice-gent of the Lord for the gathering in of souls into Christ's everlasting kingdom, it looks as though, in the repentant language of that great and good man, Henry Ward Beecher, in whose steps the Rev. Brown has plainly been trying to walk,—it looks as if he, the said Brown, had been, to his own soul's extreme delight, indulging in the sugared, paroxysmal kiss, about five fingers deep.

OF course we do not know the way in which the Reverend Dr. Brown's mind and emotions operate, but if he isn't on what Brother Beecher described as the ragged edge of despair, we know little of the ragged edges of anything. But, if things keep going on as they have been, without any let-up in the evolution of religious nastiness, we shall have to join the other brethren in delivering the decree of the decent people, that Dr. Brown do now from his pulpit step down and out, and cease everlastingly henceforth calling other people sinners, or trying to coax them up to the stool of repentance.

IF Dr. Brown has about his church, or his home, or he knows where there is any over-large sized stool of repentance of the true blue kind, he had better take a pre-emptory on it, for he will need it to sit on, and stand on, and sleep on, to continually cry therefrom that his sin has found him out, that he is a mighty bad minister of the Lord, that there isn't blood enough in any Lamb to wash out his sins, and that it will require a whole fold of full grown sheep to do it well.

IT surprises no one that the Spanish Government should exercise in Cuba a strict censorship over press dispatches, but that a free government like that of England should do the same thing in South Africa has stunned the journalistic mind so completely that it has not the strength left wherewith to utter a complaint. It is only speechlessly astonished. The men who are attending to England's interests have plainly come to the conclusion, which has been reached by many others, that government by newspapers should not be absolute. It does very well in times of peace, but, when war threatens, and statesmen and soldiers retire the newspapers and take their place, men of sense approve.

THE Rev. Dr. Cook of Boston has returned from abroad impaired in body. He was a much over-estimated man. Imprudent of speech, yet he was inclined to speak boldly on matters which would have engaged the sober thought of a philosopher. In his egotism he was typically American. In Seattle he referred in a public speech to local matters of a very delicate nature. In Hawaii he did likewise, and was asked by the United States Minister, who was present, to modify his remarks. The consequent humiliation doubtless preyed upon him mentally to his bodily hurt.

THE tumult over the Venezuelan difficulty has done much to down the cant about "ties of blood" between this country and England; the "brotherhood" of the two great English-speaking nations, and other bosh of the same sort. So, it is to be hoped, the present local stir in church circles will go far to expose the hypocrisy of a large number of pious humbugs, male and female, who trade upon their professions of religion and their connection with the churches.

A Book "Marie Corelli" is fond of dealing with the supernatural in some of her stories. She has written some books in which the mystical largely prevail. Her characters are, as a rule, strong, clear, and well-drawn, and, among the most ardent of her admirers, she can claim Her Britannic Majesty. Her real name is Marian Mackay, and it may be truly said that she is one of the most popular English authors of the day. But by "popular" it must not be understood that we mean a discrimination of what is best, for the writings of "Marie Corelli" are, usually, too hectic for our tastes. Her characters may be well-drawn, but they are not real characters. They are not the men and women one meets in every day life, simply because to draw such characters well requires genius, and that is something "Marie Corelli" does not possess. To our mind her writings are too stagey and her characters, no matter how well drawn, always remind us that they are aiming after effect. When we read her books we very often think that there is more sound than sense between their covers. They might have pleased us during our school days, but we have left those days behind us some decades. Now, in our mature life, we look on her writings as too ornate and unhealthy. We always look on her style as very like that of Ouida's. It is turgid and turbid, but it is not immoral. Although tainted with idiotic theosophical nonsense, yet, like Ouida in her best days, the writings of "Marie Corelli" are full of exuberant vocabulary and pyrotechnic imaginings. And, it appears to us that her last book, "The Sorrows of Satan," is very much in line with her previous books—good in its moral tone, bumptious in its dialogue; brilliant in some of its parts, but wanting in that touch of nature which causes our inner self to feel that the thing is not real, and that it is a mere chimera and a sham. True, in her present volume she is very severe upon the prurient literature of the day; she assails Mr. Swinburne, and does not spare the adjectives in her assaults; she attacks the shams which discredit what some people profess to be Christianity, and she does not avoid censuring the so-called moral loftiness of Her Majesty's Court. Although, like Ouida, her thirst for sensation is great, yet she is the opposite of Ouida in her moral perception, for "Marie Corelli" becomes exuberant in the completeness with which she denounces vice, but, withal that, her book, "The Sorrows of Satan," is delightfully diabolical in its sensationalism and in its startling situations. It gives the reader one "thrill" to every few pages, and that ought to be enough for any ordinary sensation seeker. First of all, we have Satan, who goes to London disguised as a handsome, unknown, but very wealthy, prince, while he assumes the name of Lucio Ramanas. Of course he becomes popular, and society makes him one of its idols. Then a certain titled lady appears upon the scene, and she promptly falls in love with Satan. The morality of this lady is somewhat tainted. She has been reading Swinburne's poems, and Lady Sibyl, for that is her name, has surrendered herself to Swinburne's teachings. She sees Satan, loves and is conquered, and in a fit of spasmodic passion she flings her arms around Lucio and tells of her love. This is a piece of stage play, a "thrill," a "burning incident" which gives the reader some idea of how "Marie Corelli" makes situations. But what must we think of Lucio, who, marvelous to say, pushes the fair Lady Sibyl from him, calling her hard names as he does so. This is another incident, another "thrill," for it apparently makes quite a good Satan out of Lucio. Who ever thought of making the devil a moralist before, except for a purpose? But "Marie Corelli" is nothing if not new and the inventor of "startling situations," and so she makes a Satan to answer her purpose. And then follows another "thrill," for the frail Lady Sibyl determines to commit suicide. She cannot survive her love. She had beard her adored one call her "a fair fiend," and what love-struck maid could calmly suffer her "heart strings" to be thus "torn out" and desire to live? But she will not leave the world without leaving behind her "a statement," and this "statement" furnishes the reader with many more "thrills," in fact, it is quite a battery of "thrills," and it introduces all sorts of things, Swinburne's poetry, the scientific heresies of the day, and many other things, all of which are sensational and full of flush, dramatic situations, and pyrotechnics. All of this is very like "Marie Corelli." But even as Lady Sibyl suffers "the tortures of the damned," from the effect of the poison, yet she writes on. Her fortitude is heroic. Page after page vanishes under the inspiration of her pen as she "writhes" in her death agonies. Here are more, many more, splendid "thrills." But at last the light comes, for she finds out who Lucio is! She has loved the devil, and there is the moral of the story. And as she makes the discovery she writes:

"Serve me, dear hand, once more ere I depart. * * * My tortured spirit must seize and compel you to write down this unnamable, that earthly eyes may read, and earthly souls take timely warning! * * * I know at last whom I have loved!—whom I have chosen, whom I have worshipped! * * * I know who claims my worship and drags me into yonder rolling world of flame."

This passage gives a fair idea of the general tenor of the book, which is full of "situations" and is constantly aiming after effect. No doubt the characters are strong, but they are stagey, luminous, and more like jacks-in-the-box than real men and women. We do not want our moral teachers to give us our lessons through literary fireworks or to "thrill" us into good behavior by dramatic situations as unnatural as they are unreal. We care little for the load of adjectives that are flung at us from behind the covers of sensational literature, and while we admit "Marie Corelli's" gifts as a powerful descriptive writer, yet it is the "power" of a thunder storm that alarms the unlettered and the savage, but has little effect on the cultured and the refined. This may be considered disrespectful to Her Britannic Majesty, but such is our view of one of her, alleged, favorite authors.

* "The Sorrows of Satan," by Marie Corelli.

Mrs. Campbell-Praed has given us a very old plot in her book, "Mrs. Tregaskiss." We can see nothing new in a cultured English girl marrying an Australian sheep raiser with whom she has nothing in common, nor is there anything novel in finding that, as her life at "the station" is dull and her husband unsympathetic, she is tempted to desert him for a stranger more congenial to her social aspirations. That story has been told ten thousand times, and we grow weary of the repetition, even under the gifted fingers of a brilliant writer.

Dean Hole's "Little Tour" is a book of impressions of the United States. They embrace an extended tour over this country, and we wonder that Dean Hole did not give his book some other name than "Little Four." On the whole the Dean was favorably impressed with America, but, before he warned young English gentlemen coming to this country to ranch, would it not have been well to tell his readers of the many Englishmen who have made good homes in California by the very ranching he warns his people against.

"Old World Japan" or "Legends of the Land of the Gods" is not an accurate title for a book on Japan. That country is no more the "Land of the Gods" than any other country with a mythology of its own. Nor do the so-called "legends" deserve their name, for there is little, if any, legendary lore about them. They tell us nothing about the mythology of "Old World Japan," and, while the book is not without merit, yet the title is misleading.

Col. Dodge in his History of Gustavus Adolphus says that the great captains who must be models for whomsoever would succeed in the profession of arms were Hannibal, Alexander, Cæsar, Gustavus Adolphus, Turenne, Prince Eugene, and Frederick. All great captains, but we should say the Great Six Captains were Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar, Gustavus Adolphus, Frederick, and Napoleon.

There were seven hundred books issued from the American press last year. This does not include reprints, juvenile books, or the great mass of cheap trash, which were placed on the market, but it only refers to such books as may be expected to command respectful attention.

Some of the literary papers are discussing the difference between Dickens and Thackeray as readers, and one of them in particular is showing a want of knowledge of the subject. As for Dickens, his readings were a great success. The author of the "Christmas Carol" had every possible quality which could be needed to make a great public reader. He had a magnificent voice, a strikingly handsome face, with eyes that lighted like stars. Some people did not like the way he read Sam Weller, but that was the extent of the criticism on Dickens. But it was different with Thackeray. He, too, was a splendid reader, but Thackeray did not read from his own novels as Dickens did. If he had, he would in all probability have failed. Dickens was alive, and you could almost fancy the figures he spoke for, were on the stage by his side, but Thackeray read as a cultured gentleman to a cultured audience, and with all his brilliancy he never stirred his hearers as Dickens did—never.

The Chinese department of the British Museum Library contains a single work which occupies no fewer than 5,020 volumes. It is an encyclopedia of the literature of China, covering a period of twenty-eight centuries—from 1000 years B. C. to A. D. 1700. It is written in the Chinese language, from copper type cast by Jesuit missionaries, by order of the Emperor Kang-he, and it took a commission of learned Chinese forty years to complete the work.

A WOMAN'S WAY.

WHY comes he not? The hour is late,
He ne'er forgot before;
I sit in silence and wait
His step outside my door.
I thought for once I would surprise
That truant love of mine;
But all untouched the supper lies,
Unop'd the sparkling wine.
The violets I bought for him
Are wilting in despair;
My blushing rose—his foolish whim—
Is burning in my hair.
Men are so strange; they seldom think
Of things as women do;
They love as they may eat or drink,
Forgetting all when through.
We women venture much, it seems,
On what is merely chance;
And many find the blade that gleams
Behind a lover's glance.
Can he be false? I still can feel
His kiss. I hear the vow
He made that night when he did steal
The love he turns from now.
Some say there is a God above,
And some that it is Fate;
But hush, his step—his knock! "O Love,
'Twas wrong to come so late!"

HOWARD V. SUTHERLAND.

Protects Users of "Royal."

The decision of Judge Showalter in a recent case that came up before him sustains the claims of the Royal company to the exclusive use of the name "Royal" as a trademark for its baking powder. The special importance of this decision consists in the protection which it assures to the millions of consumers of Royal baking powder against inferior and unwholesome compounds. The excellence of this article has caused it to be highly esteemed and largely used almost the world over. Its high standard of quality having been always maintained, consumers have come to rely implicitly upon the "Royal" brand as the most wholesome and efficient of any in the market. The cupidity of other manufacturers is excited by this high reputation and large demand. Very few of the hundreds of baking powders on the market are safe to use. If their makers could sell them under the name of a well-known, reputable brand incalculable damage would be done to the public health by the deception. The determination of the Royal Baking Powder Company to protect the users of the Royal baking powder against imitators by a rigid prosecution of them makes such imitations of its brand extremely rare.—Chicago Times-Herald.

IN GLAD WEATHER.—CHARLES B. GOING, IN SCRIBNER'S.

I DO not know what skies there were,
Nor if the wind was high or low;
I think I heard the branches stir
A little, when we turned to go;
I think I saw the grasses sway
As if they tried to kiss your feet—
And yet, it seems like yesterday,
That day together, sweet!
I think it must have been in May;
I think the sunlight must have shone;
I know a scent of springtime lay
Across the fields; we were alone,
We went together, you and I;
How could I look beyond your eyes?
If you were only standing by
I did not miss the skies!
I could not tell if evening glowed,
Or noonday heat lay white and still Beyond the shadows of the road;
I only watched your face, until
I knew it was the gladdest day,
The sweetest day that summer knew—
The time when we two stole away
And I saw only you!

LITTLE BOPEEP—LITTLE BOY BLUE.—SAMUEL MINTURN PECK.

It happened one morning that Little Bopeep
While watching her frolicsome, mischievous sheep
Out in the meadow, fell fast asleep.

By her wind-blown tresses and rose-leaf pout,
And her dimpling smile, you'd have guessed, no doubt,
'Twas love, love, love, she was dreaming about.

As she lay there asleep came Little Boy Blue,
Right over the stile where the daisies grew;
Entranced by the picture he stopped in the dew.

So wily bewitching that beautiful morn,
Was Little Bopeep that he dropped his horn
And thought no more of the cows in the corn.

Our sorrows are many, our pleasures are few;
O moment propitious! What could a man do?
He kissed the wee lassie, that Little Boy Blue!

At the smack the woolies stood all in a row,
And whispered each other, "We're clearly de trop;
Such conduct is perfectly shocking—let's go!"

SONG.—WILLIAM WATSON, IN LONDON SPECTATOR.

O like a queen's her happy tread,
And like a queen's her golden head!
But O, at last, when all is said,
Her woman's heart for me!

We wandered where the river gleamed
'Neath oaks that mused and pines that dreamed,
A wild thing of the woods she seemed,
So prond, and pure, and free!

All heaven drew nigh to hear her sing,
When from her lips her soul took wing;
The oaks forgot their pondering,
The pines their reverie.

And O, her happy queenly tread,
And O, her queenly golden head!
But O, her heart, when all is said,
Her woman's heart for me!

THE DIFFERENCE.—G. S.

Silly fool, 'tis in vain you pursue,
She heeds not the words that you say!
Can't you see, as you fruitlessly woo,
That her thoughts are with one who's away?
That tho' far all her love he commands
Of which you can have not the least part?
You are near, you can touch her dear hands;
He is nearer—he touches her heart.

DEAR EDITH:—As I said last week, extravagance grows apace. It takes an artist nowadays to design a gown, and a full purse to pay for it. A ball-dress for instance—filmy gauzes, figured with colors which would be the envy of Watteau or Fragoniucré; exquisite chiffons in rainbow tints; dainty Louis Quinze taffetas;—it all involves artistic genius to make the combination.

The mandolin sleeve, with the fullness drooping below the elbow, and the full bishop sleeve gathered into a colonial cuff, are the two most popular styles. Although the sleeve is beginning to cling to the arm more and more, the fullness receding to the top, fitted to the figure in small flat pleats.

Skirts are as full as ever. The panel front of a different material with overlapping sides has become the swagger style. The front is made of a straight width, folded over to form a wide box-pleat. As a rule the skirt is fitted closely to the hips.

The hats and bonnets this season are as gorgeous as ever. What with splendid velvet bats crowded with fluffy plumes and flashing buckles or iridescent beads and gaudy bows, life in the beau monde is expensive.

Persian ribbon in its strange, Oriental tints are used at very extreme width. Then there are capots of wrought gold-net with mercury wings of lustrous metallic shimmer.

And, by the way, speaking of underwear, we have at last a perfect corset. It's called the "R. & G.," and you can get it in over a hundred different patterns. It lasts till "doomsday," but the chief reason why I like it so much is that it adapts itself at once to each particular curve of the figure, and does not cost any more than the others.

The New Berthas are very artistic, and as usual flowers are still very popular. One which is composed of graceful sprays of Locust-blossoms—yellow—goes well with black tulle. Light grecu leaves add to the charming effect.

Then there are the lace Berthas which are studded with imitation gems that are brilliant in either black or white lace.

Poplin in gay plaid tartans is growing in favor more and more every day, and they make an effective combination.

Velvet, of course, still serves for capes and coats, as well as gowns. The tasteful Louis Quinze coats are very attractive when made of the striped material.

Petticoats are another luxury nowadays, and black taffeta or satin is the rule, but for receptions and evening wear, all sorts of colors in taffeta and China silk or brocades are in vogue.

Eight or ten little ruffles, cut in leaf points, and overlapping each other, are pretty, and they are managed so as to alternate with pleatings of white or black lace—verily a gown in itself.

To be really swell, one must have a skirt to match the silk-lining of every costume in her wardrobe, so as not to make the difference noticeable.

The flaring Marie de Medici and the officers' collars with flat bands figure quite prominently, and often they are combined. The high inside collar is fastened tightly about the throat, the Marie de Medici collar being made of lace or velvet and carefully wired out to make a graceful frame for a beautiful face.

BELINDA.

THE sudden and sad death of Charles K. Shattuck, the junior member of the firm of E. J. Shattuck & Co., last month, has not interrupted the business of this well known house, over which the deceased partner presided so successfully for fifteen years. Mr. E. J. Shattuck, his brother, has just returned from the East, and is renewing his old friendships with San Francisco's business men. His extensive commercial affairs in New York are in excellent shape, and the energy which he has exerted heretofore in the management of his affairs will not be relaxed.

If bicycling is an excellent preventive of disease and a promoter of good health, it is of no less value as a remedy for certain pathological conditions, says Dr. Henry J. Garrigue, in the January Forum. By its effect on respiration and digestion, bicycling becomes a potent remedy for anemia, that condition of the blood which consists in a diminution of the red blood-corpuscles, and shows itself in pallor of the skin and the mucous membranes. Numerous nervous troubles are relieved or cured by this exercise: such as neurasthenia, or nervous prostration,—a condition usually due to overwork or worry, and in which the normal strength is lost, and the slightest exertion causes fatigue and physical and mental exhaustion. The same holds good in regard to headache, insomnia, and neuralgia. Among the nervous affections benefited by bicycle-riding may also be included that troublesome disease, asthma, a cramp-like contraction of the muscles of the bronchial tubes, which causes a painful sensation of choking. In the beginning of phthisis, where parts of the lung tissue become condensed and less pervious, moderate bicycle-riding is helpful. Many diseases of the intestinal canal—such as dyspepsia, constipation, and hemorrhoids—yield to the effects of wheeling. A case has recently come to the writer's knowledge in which the stiffness remaining after a fracture of the leg was successfully treated by riding a bicycle.

But if bicycling is a valuable resource in certain diseased conditions, there are numerous others in which it is harmful or should only be indulged in very cautiously. Most acute diseases demand rest, and bid the cyclist abstain from his favorite pursuit; and many chronic diseases are made worse by riding. Since wheeling considerably increases the rate of the respiratory movements it would be folly for a person with advanced pulmonary consumption to attempt to ride. The heart being whipped unmercifully to work in driving the machine, wheeling should be strictly forbidden in serious diseases of this organ; and persons affected with minor cardiac troubles ought at least never to race or otherwise expose the heart to a fatigue which it is not prepared to stand.

Last winter the New York Legislature enacted a law for the benefit of Niagara County, providing for an annual tax of 50 cents on every bicycle, the money to be used for the building of cinder paths and improving the roads generally for wheelmen. Under this law the board of supervisors appoints two commissioners, who must be wheelmen and serve without pay, to supervise the construction of the bicycle roads. Such action as this shows to what an extent the use of the bicycle may be expected to affect even legislation in this country, and the best of the whole thing is that whatever influence the bicycle has exerted in the past and may be expected to exist in the future in a public way can only be in the line of what is good and useful.

CYCLING SIGNALS.—French wheelmen have adopted a code of signals by whistle. The whistle is much used in France in preference to the bell. Following are a few of the signals used:

Ordinary alarm, three short notes: — — —.

Halt, one long-drawn note: —————.

Come ahead or follow me, to long notes: —————.

"Where are you?" or "We are here," three half-long notes: — — — — —.

Turn to the right, one long drawn note, one short: — — —.

Turn to the left, one long drawn note, two short: — — —.

Lookout! there is danger ahead, ten sharp notes in quick succession: — — — — —.

Call for help, three short and one long note, several times in succession: — — — — —.

this coast, is to be remarked in the career of C. E. Martling, manager of the Pacific Coast branch of the Syracuse Bicycle Company. Two years ago he opened business in Oakland at 107 San Pablo Ave., and had an immediate and extensive patronage, in fact, so much so that recently he has taken up the spacious quarters at 224 Sutter street, which are tinted to suit the beautiful crimson shade of the Syracuse Bicycle. Mr. Martling is a member of many clubs on this coast, among others of the Bay City, the Reliance, and Lakeside Tennis, besides being an active factor in the Alameda County Good Roads Association.

The winter bicycle season is in full swing, and all over the State bicycle clubs, with captains, lieutenants, and sub-officers are being organized. In fact, we should have a splendid bicycle corps for our militia in case of war. J. M. Litchfield, the tailor, at 12 Post street, has supplied the soldier-like shoulder-straps which all the corps have adopted here.

"It is particularly hard that the price of camphor should be forced up so high this year, of all others, when there are so many pairs of bloomers to be preserved."

There is no occasion for the citizens of San Francisco to go to the beach for a salt water bath when they can be accommodated with such excellent provisions as are made at the Lurline Baths, situated at the corner of Bush and Larkin streets. These baths are open summer and winter, and are furnished with hot and cold water for tub bathing or a swim. They furnish health, comfort, and amusement. Open at six o'clock A. M. for early bathers. THINGS TO THINK OF.

Only one person in a thousand dies of old age.

Rice forms the chief food of about a third of the human race.

A needle will float if carefully placed upon the surface of a basin of water.

The weight of blood in the adult human body averages from twenty-five to thirty-five pounds.

The statement has been made, and seems incredible, that all the gold in the world would fit in a room twenty-four feet each way.

Gold is yellow only by reflected light. If a leaf of gold, as ordinarily used by gilders, be placed between two pieces of glass, and held up to the light, it will be seen to transmit a brilliant green light.

If a delicate piece of lace be placed between an iron plate and a disk of gunpowder, and the latter be exploded the lace will be utterly destroyed, but its impression will be clearly stamped on the iron.

There are no less than twenty-eight bones in one hand and wrist, and about as many in a foot and an ankle. The bones of the hand and feet are equal in number to one-half of all the bones in the human body.

An ordinary spider thread is capable of bearing a weight of three grains, while a steel thread of the same thickness would support less than two.

The greatest inland sea is the Caspian, which is seven hundred miles long by two hundred and seventy in width.

An Oriental method of detecting crime is to take several persons suspected of the offense and require them to chew dry wheat. The nervous fears of the guilty man seal up his salivary glands, and he chokes in attempting to reduce the grain to pulp.

The starfish fastens itself to the body it wishes to feed on, turns its stomach inside out, and enwraps its prey with this useful organ.

One of the best remedies for a burn is Carron oil, a mixture of equal parts of linseed or olive oil with lime water. Another admirable remedy is bicarbonate of soda—that is, cooking soda—a small box of which should always be kept at hand for immediate use.

Every soldier knows that a horse will not step on a man intentionally. It is a standing order in the British cavalry if a trooper becomes dismounted he must lie still. If he does this the whole squadron will pass over him without doing him injury.

The most valuable fur in the world is that from the belly of the Russian silver fox. The color is black, with here and there a tip of silver. The fur is used exclusively for linings, and though exceedingly warm, is so light that the material for a whole coat or cloak only weighs but a few ounces. The black fur of the silver fox is also valuable, but is used for trimmings and outside wear.—Colliers Weekly.

THE MIDGET OF PLANT LIFE.

THE midget of the whole tree family is the Greenland birch. It is a perfect tree in every sense of that term, and lives its allotted number of years (from seventy-five to one hundred and thirty), says St. Louis Republic, just as other species of the great birch family do, although its height, under the most favorable conditions, seldom exceed ten inches. Whole bluffs of the east and southeast coast of Greenland are covered with "thickets" of this diminutive species of woody plant, and in many places, where the soil is uncommonly poor and frozen from eight to ten months a year, a "forest" of these trees will flourish for half a century without growing to a height exceeding four inches.

Kentucky is famous for its Bourbon whiskies, and its brands are numerous. Among those that have stood the test of time and use is the celebrated J. F. Cutter. The best judges have declared it to be the most excellent in the market. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are the agents for this celebrated brand, for which they have established a large trade. They are also agents for the Argonaut brand of Kentucky Bourbon.

A DUEL with sabres has not been regarded without a disfavor. It is true one took place between two Hungarian gentlemen, but it is thought the dueling laws have been set by France, and it is not the thing to break them. A duel with sabres is impossible between Frenchmen; it is thought barbaric; the rapier is consequently the only arme blanche that can be used. A Frenchman is authorized to refuse a duel with any other weapon than the rapier or pistol. It is true the sabre is used for dueling in Spain and in some parts of Italy, also in Austria, Germany, and Russia: thus the majority seems to be in its favor.

—Queens often find themselves in a dilemma when they have to receive repugnant persons. Queen Margherita of Italy is a devout Catholic, and holds very strict views on marriage. When Crispi came to power his first wife was still alive, as was also the first husband of his second wife. At first the Queen stoutly refused to admit Donna Lina to court, and a tremendous storm ensued. Her Majesty, however, had to give way, and her words on the occasion were: "All right! tell Signor Crispi I will receive his wife; but I will receive only one of them, and I insist it must always be the same one."

—Speaker Reed is a chauged mau. He is no longer the snapping, snarling, sarcastic person that he used to be. Whether this revolution in his manner has been caused by the increase of the fatty matter of his physical structure, or by the cutting off of his mustache, or by policy dictated by his Presidential aspirations, is a question. We concede that it is to the interest of the House that Reed should play the part of an amiable man; but we don't believe that it is going to help him in his candidacy.—Richmond Dispatch.

—Lucy Cleveland, in a letter to the New York Recorder, reveals the fact that Amélie Rives wrote "According to St. John" for the purpose of defraying expenses due a French surgical scientist for remedying deformity of features in the face of a gifted but poor lady friend of hers. The surgeon's bill was $6000, and that amount was paid Miss Rives for her story by The Cosmopolitan.

—In several of the mountain cantons of Switzerland a bride receives a most prosaic and curious wedding gift, a Gruyere cheese. It is made by the bride's girl friends, and is of great size. In the new house it is put under a glass case and never eaten. Every important family event is recorded on the rind, so that it serves as a family Bible.

—The crusaders against rice-throwing at weddings, who have the sedate support of the Lancet, now have the law upon their side. A London magistrate has decided that to throw rice at a newly-married man for luck amounts to an assault.

—It has been decided by an Ohio court that wives are legally responsible for the support of their husbands when the husbands cannot furnish the support. Of course the new woman will agree to this.

—The Sacred Congregation of Rites at Rome has issued a decree forbidding bishops approving the constitution and by-laws of any society that has not some religious or moral purpose in view.

STAINING WOOD BLACK.—A process that is much employed for the above purpose consists in painting the wood consecutively with copper sulphate solution (1 per cent) and alcoholic aniline acetate (equal parts of alcohol and acetate.) A very durable black—and the nearest approach to real ebony—is readily obtained by moistening the surface of the wood with dilute sulphuric acid (1:20) and subsequently applying heat. A temperature of 60 deg. —90 deg. C., suffices in a very few minutes to produce the desired result. An excellent black was obtained in this way on beech, bass, and boxwood; while a second treatment with acid was necessary in the case of cherry, walnut, and birch. With oak and ash the results were not so good; and apple, and different varieties of pine, were still less amenable to the process, pine especially being unevenly stained. In order to afterward remove the acid from the wood, it might be well to thoroughly wash the latter with dilute soda solution, followed by clean water. It is unlikely that this method can be applied to any but small articles, because of the risk of possible fractures during the necessary heating of the wood.—Badische Gewerbezeitung.

How to "SALT" ALMONDS.—To prepare salted almonds, blanch them by pouring boiling water over them and rubbing the brown skin off with a rough cloth. When they are blanched and quite dry measure them, and over each cupful of nuts pour a tablespoonful of the best olive oil. Let them stand for an hour, and then sprinkle a tablespoonful of salt over each cupful, mixing it thoroughly. Spread them out on a flat tin pan, and put them in a not too hot oven until they have become a delicate brown.—Ladies' Home Journal.

IMPORTED CEMENTS.—"Why do we import cements instead of making all we use?" The answer is simple as rolling off a log. The average price abroad—say in Belgium—is only $1 39 per barrel. We can't make it for the price. True, good cements are made in this country for even less than that, but they are mostly plain hydraulic (lime) cements, and not to be compared with "Portland."—American Homes.

ORE AND SHIPBUILDING MATERIAL.—Cleveland dispatches report that the navigation on the lakes, just closed, has broken all records both in the movement of ore and ship-building material. The consumption of steel thus far this year has exceeded all calculations. It is estimated that the quantity of ore being consumed this year is almost double what it was a year ago.

OILS.—New linseed oil is unfit for painting; it should be at least six months old, and is better if kept for several years. By storing the oil in tanks the water and mucilage are precipitated as a paste called "foots." Oil is bleached on a large scale by placing it in shallow troughs lined with lead and covered with glass. The lead aids in the decoloration.

LIQUID GLUE.—According to German authority, a new and excellent liquid glue is made by dissolving gelatin in a solution of chloral hydrate in water. Ordinary glue may replace the gelatin for ordinary use. This cement is said to dry quickly, to have great adhesiveness, and to remain unchanged indefinitely.

GASOLINE ENGINES.—Not only has the gasoline engine proved superior to electrical appliances on motor carriages, but it is now claimed that street cars propelled in much the same way will come to supersede in time the present electric cars, experts saying that such cars can be run at a cost of one cent a horse power per mile.

THE SUMMONS CAME TOO LATE.

A REFRESHMENT room at Earl's Court. Enter Mrs. and Miss Ormerod. As they pass one of the tables, a young man starts violently, half rises, and takes off his hat. Mrs. Ormerod eyes him with an impertinent stare, and Miss Ormerod looks fixedly at the wall beyond him. The young man hastily resumes his seat. When they have found seats at a safe distance and ordered refreshment, the ladies give vent to their indignation.

"Well, Laura, of all the impudent—"

"Mr. Marston never was noted for his modesty, mother."

"I should think not; but London is the place to bring him to his senses. He'll soon find his level here."

"I wonder what he is doing? He seems well dressed."

"Counter-jumping or shop-lifting, I should imagine. That's all he's fit for."

"He could waltz divinely."

"Then he had one redeeming virtue. Perhaps he teaches dancing."

As the band outside ceases playing, sundry people saunter in.

"Why, there's Sir William! I do hope he'll see us."

"Why doesn't the man look this way?"

"If he isn't talking to Mr. Marston! How flattered that young man must feel!"

"Perhaps he is ordering a new coat."

"Or, more likely, complaining about the old one."

"I hope he is arranging for some dancing lessons. He waltzes horribly."

"You could forgive that if he were only good-looking."

"At any rate, he is very good-natured."

"Or he wouldn't be talking to young Marston."

"At last he sees us!"

The ladies bow gracefully. Sir William walks across to them.

"Now, whoever would have thought of meeting you here?"

"How badly expressed, Sir William! An 'unexpected pleasure' would have sounded so much better."

"I sit corrected. I see, I see; are they good?"

"Very bad; but we are pretending it's summer."

"By the way, Laura and I are quite dying to know what you have in common with Mr. Marston."

"A very great deal, Mrs. Ormerod."

"Coats, and—waistcoats?"

"Dancing?"

"Really, I ought to have had an ice, for without one I see no connection. You know Marston, then?"

"He was a clerk in father's office. We did know him, mother?"

"Certainly, my dear. Sir William will understand the degree of intimacy that indicates."

"Mr. Marston is a friend of mine."

"How extremely condescending of you to put it that way. Mr. Marston would be flattered if he heard you."

"I fail to see why."

"Look at your different positions in life. You are a man of title."

"And Marston is a man of genius—a somewhat scarcer article."

"Why, what has he done?"

"Have you not read 'Waiting'?"

"Of course. Some one sent me a copy. I never found out who. But that was by 'Godfrey Newcome.'"

"Quite so—Marston's pseudonym. Then I know you have seen his play, for I was in your box at the Lyceum—on Tuesday, wasn't it?"

"Did Mr. Marston write My Lady Disdainful?"

"Indeed he did, Miss Ormerod. I am surprised you did not know it."

Miss Ormerod appears lost in thought. Then she sees Marston rising to go; she turns quickly to Sir William.

"Do me a favor. Tell Mr. Marston I wish to renew our old friendship."

"Delighted."

He walks after Marston.

"Marstou, au old frieud wishes to speak to you—Miss Ormerod."

"Does she?" A pause. "You remember what I told you about that girl in the country who said she would give her answer when I was famous?"

"Yes."

"I told her she would have to send for me then, as I would never ask again. You have just brought her summons."

"The dennee I have!"

"She has only just learnt that I am—or a success?"

"Not a whisper of it till I told her."

"I thought so. She cut me dead a quarter of an hour ago. It's too late now, old man. Tell her what you like, only don't hurt her unnecessarily."

"All right, sonny, I understand."

Rejoining the ladies—

"Mr. Marston wishes me to say he would have been delighted to have had your message a quarter of an hour earlier, but, as it is—"

"Well, Sir William, as it is?"

"As it is, Marston and I are returning to town together. Good afternoon, ladies."—The Sketch.

NOT TRUSTING THE LAWYER.—A Durham miner, aged 73, visited a Newcastle lawyer (a bachelor) for the purpose of making his will. The old man's property consisted of two small cottages, which had cost him £150, and a little furniture. The lawyer having asked his client how he wished to dispose of his property, the latter replied: "Ma old woman hes to hev all se long as she's my widow. Efter that ma bairns gets all." "What age is your old woman?" asked the lawyer. "Seventy-two," replied the miner. "And how long have you and your wife been married?" asked the lawyer. "Over fifty years," replied the miner. Thereupon the lawyer suggested to his client that he should give the wife the interest during her life, whether she continued a widow or otherwise. "Hinney, aa winnot; aa'll hev ma aan way," said the miner. "But surely," replied the lawyer, "you don't expect your old woman, 72 years old, would marry again?" The miner, looking the lawyer full in the face, answered with much solemnity: "Wey, hinney, thor's nae knaaing what young cheps like yourself will de for money."—Current Literature.

THE pace of November was almost too rapid for our small society to keep up, and there has been a gradual slackening down ever since the middle of last month. It was said that once the New Year holiday had passed, the season would be one mad whirl until its close, but so far the prediction has scarcely been realized. There were three first appearances at as many houses on Monday night for society to take choice from for its theatre parties, and they were all well patronized, while many of the suppers that followed were jolly affairs. There was a pleasant "at home" at the rooms of the Sketch Club on Tuesday, the usual monthly reception day of the members.

Last evening the Friday Fortnightly had their usual dance at Lunt's Hall; Miss Grace Sabin gave a very charming party at her home on California street, and the long anticipated, several times postponed, reception at the George Pope's became an accomplished fact; and just here it may be said that Mrs. Dan Murphy's friends are delighted to hear of her convalescence after her recent serious illness in New York.

Among to-day's attractions will be Ed Townsend's readings from his popular novel of "Chimmie Fadden," in conjunction with a musical programme in the Auditorium of the Young Men's Christian Association building, under the auspices of the Mercantile Library Auxiliary. Mr. Andrew Bogart will give a song recital at Golden Gate Hall, and the first of Mrs. Jewett's "recitals" takes place at that lady's residence on Bush street.

The cotillion of the Friday Night Club last week was led, as usual, by Mr. Greenway, with Miss Romietta Wallace as his partner, and while no new figures were introduced, those danced were pretty and greatly admired by the on-lookers. The attendance was larger than anticipated, the ladies' gowns handsome, and the supper excellent. The interest regarding the next meeting of the club, which will be the Leap Year cotillion on Friday evening of next week, is very great. Miss Sallie Maynard will have the assistance of Miss Emily Hager, who is quite a veteran in like affairs; it will be a bal pondre, and great things are expected at the hands of the young lady leaders.

The crowning joy of the holiday week was the dinner dance at the Richelieu on Saturday evening. Mrs. Levy always requests her guests to invite one or more of their friends to dine with them during the New Year week, but on this occasion they were not limited to number, the result being a delicious dinner, a lively dance, and a charming little supper. Another pleasant affair of last Saturday was the young ladies' luncheon at Mrs. D. N. Neustadter's on Van Ness avenue, which was followed by a matinee party at the Baldwin.

Engagement entertainments have been largely in evidence for some time past, and among the couples so complimented by their friends were Miss Rose Walter and Abe Monteiff. Miss Gertrude Naphthaly and Lionel Feigenbaum, Miss Belle Grant and Edward Pond, the culminating event to the latter couple being the very handsome dinner given last week by the mother of the groom-elect, Mrs. E. B. Pond. There were thirty guests at table, combining the married and the single, and the affair is spoken of as having been most enjoyable.

Mrs. I. N. Walter's dinner to her niece was also a grand affair, at which twenty-five guests assembled around the elaborately spread board. Miss Rose Neustadter is another who has been largely entertained by her friends prior to her departure Eastward and to Europe.

Among recent diners one of the most elaborate was given by Dr. and Mrs. R. A. McLean last week, to which sixteen were invited to meet the guests of honor, Governor and Mrs. Budd. Mrs. W. I. Kip was a hostess who presided over a very large dinner party on Wednesday of this week.

Miss Jennie Catherwood has been the pioneer in the Sunday tea line this winter, vocal music being quite a feature of her recent entertainment. Miss Daisy Vau Ness's tea was also a pleasant one, and the same may be said of those over which Miss McNutt and Miss Genevieve Goad presided.

The event of the week in Jewish circles was the wedding of Miss Adele Dannenbaum and Daniel Fletcher; but the ceremony which is expected to eclipse all previous like gatherings will take place at the Concordia Club rooms on Tuesday evening of next week, when Miss Gertrude Naphthaly and Lionel Feigenbaum will be the bride and groom. The Jarboe-Bull nuptials have been finally set to come off on the second of February, and the young couple are to spend several months in California ere going East to reside, which is pleasant news for Miss Kate's friends, among whom she is so great a favorite.

An exceedingly pretty wedding was that of Miss Adele Dannenbaum and David Fletcher, which took place on Wednesday evening at the residence of the bride's parents, on Octavia and Bush streets. The house was elaborately decorated, the display of flowers being unusual for this season of the year, but the chief effect was produced in the large parlor, where white and green were the hues, and the bower wherein the young couple stood during the marriage ceremony was an exquisite creation of ferns and orange blossoms, tiny wedding bells depending from the front; the Reverend Dr. Voorsanger was the officiating clergyman, who made the happy couple "one flesh." The bride's costume was of heavy white satin, artistically draped on the corsage with point lace and bunches of orange blossoms; the long flowing veil was also caught with a spray of the bridal blossoms, while the bouquet was of lilies of the valley. The maid of honor, Miss Hulda Dannenbaum, sister of the bride, was gowned in white chiffon and lace over white silk, the corsage square filled in with rare lace. Mrs. Dannenbaum's gown was of corded silk of a ruby hue, with long train covered with duchesse lace, and she wore superb diamonds. Henry Schussler was the groom's best man. After the congratulations to the bride and groom, the guests repaired to the dining-room, where an elegant supper was served by Ludwig amid Christmas holly berries and palms. The festivities were kept up until a late hour, with dancing, etc. Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher will, upon their return from their honeymoon trip, reside for a time at 1630 Octavia street, where they will receive their friends.

Among the gatherings of next week will be the reception at the Young Men's Christian Association Building, on Thursday evening. It will be under the auspices of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, and a very excellent musical programme has been arranged by Mr. Sabin, the organist of that church.

Though it would be generally supposed that the winter, and especially such a frosty one as we have enjoyed of late, is hardly the time for a pleasant coaching party, the recent one given by Jas. D. Phelan proved delightful. The party of eight started from San Jose, their destination the Lick Observatory, and, that it was most enjoyable, it is only necessary to hear it dilated upon by any of the aforesaid eight to be quite convinced of the fact.

The University Club has been the locale of several very pretty luncheon parties of late. Among those of note were the party arranged by Mrs. Willie Ashe to meet her sister-in-law, Mrs. Harold Sewell, nee Ashe, and the elaborate one given by the Misses Williams to a number of the season's buds. Several more will take place at the Club next week; one of them will be the largest of the season so far.

Society is delighted to welcome to its fold Mr. and Miss Warburton, who promise to be decided acquisitions. Mr. Warburton is the recently appointed British Consul-General at this port, and his daughter, Miss Warburton, is spoken of as a very charming young lady.

The Entre Nous Cotillion Club will give a "Fancy Dress Leap Year German" on Friday evening, January 31st, at the Palace Hotel. It promises to be one of the most successful and brilliant assemblies of the winter season.

The Musical Courier. (New York Weekly) October 9, '95, contained nearly a three-column interview with the organist, William C. Carl, upon his return East from a Western tour, wherein Mr. Carl takes occasion to remark thusly about our fellow townsman, musical Marcus Henry: "My manager, Mr. Marcus M. Henry, of San Francisco, of course looked after all this, and here I would like to say a word in behalf of his indefatigable labors in my behalf, which were always crowned with success. He was simply untiring in his energies, and always so discreet and intelligent in his plans that I felt absolutely safe and prosperous in his hands from the outset. He certainly worked for my interests well, and I feel that I owe him a great deal."

Miss Lillian O'Connell, daughter of Captain J. J. O'Connell, U. S. A., is an accomplished reader and elocutionist. Miss O'Connell will give this evening, at Mrs. Jewett's house, an illustration of early Colonial life, with descriptive matter in poetry and prose. This bright young lady has made this subject a special study, and her treatment of this interesting topic has been highly commended in the East.

The engagement is announced of Miss Jane F. Masten, daughter of N. K. Masten, to Edwin C. Ewell, now with the H. S. Crocker Company. The wedding will take place shortly after Lent.

Chris Jorgensen gave a very delightful musicale at his studio, 325 Montgomery street, on Wednesday evening.

STOPPING A GREAT SHIP.

THE motion of a steamship on the Atlantic when the sea is calm is so smooth and steady that the passenger hardly realizes the tremendous momentum of the vessel under his feet. A collision even after the engines have been slowed down gives a startling revelation of the energy of motion. The energy can also be accurately calculated with the aid of mathematical formulas, and the time and distance within which the motion can be totally arrested and the ship be brought to a stand may be ascertained in a similar manner. This calculation has recently been made for several well known ships. To stop the Etruria whose "displacement" is 9,680 tons, horse power 14,321 and speed 20.18 knots an hour, 2 min. and 47 sec. are required, and during the process of stopping the ship will forge ahead 2,464 ft., which is only 176 ft. less than half a mile. The United States cruiser Columbia with a displacement of 7,350 tons, 17,991 horse power and a speed of 22.8 knots, can be stopped in 2 min. and 15 sec., and within a space of 2,147 ft. The little flyer, Cushing, also of the United States navy, whose displacement is only 105 tons, and horse power, 1,754, while its speed is 22.48 knots, can be stopped within a distance of 301 ft. in 18.4 sec. In each case the vessel is supposed to be going at full speed and the stoppage is produced by reversing the action of the propelling machinery.—Youth's Companion.

ALREADY the splendid Carnival at Truckee, in the heart of the great Sierra Nevada mountains, with its mammoth ice palace, toboggan sliding, skating, sleigh riding, and all the lovely pastimes incident to winter, has aroused the utmost excitement throughout the Coast. A big excursion has been organized every night this last week from Reno or the other neighboring towns, and now especial rates have been made by the railroad, enabling San Franciscans to see the gigantic Palace, with its glistening and iridescent tints, at a minimum expense. This Saturday (to-night) a train will leave for Truckee, returning in time to bring its passengers home early next Monday morning. The palace itself is fairy-like in splendor, but it's the tobogganing that catches the visitors' hearts.

The luxury and domestic comfort which Colonel Brennan is furnishing at the Pleasanton Hotel this winter has made him a sort of household saint.

HENRY IRVING said that Bignon's famous restaurant had not afforded him the luxuries of the Maison Riche, corner Geary street and Grant avenue, during his sojourn in San Francisco.

THE AEOLIAN

A HOME ORCHESTRA.

And that Queen of Song, Mme. Melba, says: "I could not understand how an instrument requiring no musical knowledge in the performer could be artistic from a musician's standpoint. I believe no one can understand it unless they do as I did—see it and hear it played."

Queen Victoria and Mrs. Grover Cleveland heard it—and bought it. You can come and hear it—we invite every lover of music and harmony. It costs no more than a piano—yet its possibilities are even greater. It is a Grand Parlor Orchestra, partly automatic, but with volume, speed, and expression under the control of the player. It is the one and only instrument for those who have music in their souls, though not in their fingers. Come and hear it, no matter whether you can afford to buy it or not.

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

There is nothing so agonizing to the fine skin of vanity as the application of a rough truth.—Bulwer.

No persons are more frequently wrong than those who will not admit they are wrong.—Rochefoucauld.

As to people saying a few idle words about us, we must not mind that, any more than the old church steeple minds the rooks cawing about it.—George Eliot.

The slanderer inflicts wrong by calumniating the absent; and he who gives credit to the calumny before he knows its truth is equally guilty.—Herodotus.

The excesses of our youth are drafts upon our old age, payable with interest about thirty years after date.—Colton.

A man is one whose body has been trained to be the ready servant of his mind; whose passions are trained to be the servants of his will; who enjoys the beautiful, loves truth, hates wrong, loves to do good, and respects others as himself.—Anon.

Laughter is a most healthful exertion; it is one of the greatest helps to digestion with which I am acquainted; and the custom prevalent among our forefathers, of exciting it at table by jesters and buffoons, was founded on true medical principles.—Hufeland.

To know that there are some souls, hearts and minds, here and there, who trust and whom we trust, some who know us and whom we know, some on whom we can always rely, and who will always rely on us, makes a paradise of this great world. This makes our life really life.—James Freeman Clarke.

SAN FRANCISCO NEWS LETTER

Vol. LII.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1896.

Number 3.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT, 605-607-613 Merchant street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

FATHER Yorke can write. Also he can get mad. The A. P. A. has awakened a very lively passenger.

IT is a fortunate thing for the peace of mankind that it is Engineer Jack Hammond who has been taken into custody by the Boers and not General Dick Hammond. Thank God, that warrior is still with us, and South Africa is a land many weeks distant.

THE spectacle of the Rev. C. O. Brown in the pulpit of the First Congregational Church of San Francisco on Sunday last is one that will not soon be forgotten. And it is one from which that church will long suffer. Common decency is not to be affronted with impunity even by a body of Christian men and women.

IF England could come to a dicker with President Kruger and exchange her new poet laureate for Dr. Jameson—the prisoner to be dealt with as the Boers see fit—the world would be gratified and Lord Salisbury relieved from an embarrassment that doubtless causes him to turn in his bed, and Tennyson, possibly, to turn in his grave.

HEAVEN help the poor millionaires who own our daily newspapers if this theological controversy continues much longer. No man who is not at once a millionaire and a journalist can fully enter into the blood-sweating agony of one who has to steer between the Catholics on the right hand and the A. P. A. on the left. The slightest slip of the rudder may mean the loss of some nickels.

RABBI Voorsanger has raised his eloquent voice in protest against the neglect of the bome for the boarding house. It is a good topic for press and pulpit to enlarge upon. There is too strong a tendency in these times for married people to live in hotels and lodging houses, to the decay of domesticity. It is not from the boarding houses and the hotels, but from the bomes of the nation, that the virtues of the coming generation are to arise.

TWO classes of citizens are usually prepared for war—the editor of a daily paper and the ambitious soldier. The one wants news, the other fame. Not every editor, it is true, really thirsts for gore save in an indirect way. A genuine war scare ordinarily serves his purpose. But the average officer in the navy wants war. It is the opportunity of his life. He has spent his life in part with the hope of distinguishing himself. Yet the rank and file who fly much and rank little do not, upon reflection, want war; yet they must bear the brunt of battle.

IT is now apparent that with reasonably good management the Venezuela dispute will be brought to a satisfactory settlement. The English people have no disposition to go to war with the United States over the Monroe Doctrine, and the American people assuredly prefer peace to hostilities. When the whole truth as to the Venezuelan frontier has been made known—when the exact rights of the republic and Great Britain have been ascertained—England will be content to accept the situation. The tone of her press and the utterances of her public men insure this. The American Jingo is growing sad at the prospect, but as the possibility of war fades away sensible men feel relief.

SUITS against preachers, for defamation of character, are becoming numerous. Ministers need such reminders, occasionally, that they have taken out no license to slander. Nothing exceeds the sensitiveness of the average parson when his own reputation is touched, but the same man may be notorious for wanton assaults from the pulpit upon the good name of persons who may have the misfortune to fall under his displeasure.

IT is just as well that Charles S. Young is not superintendent of the public schools of San Francisco. Mr. Young is a speculator, a politician, of moderate success, having been once or twice defeated, and a boomer. His faculties are such as fit him for the overthrow of Hawaii or the annexation of Lower California. He once sold Port Angeles wild-cat lots to Washington, D. C., inhabitants—property so wild that it makes its present owners feel very tame. If he did not go down with Estee last fall he certainly has now. Were his ability to realize half equal to his faculty to plan, he were now Governor of some several States.

J. D. L. McGAUGHEY, arrested for forgery, ought to be penned up awhile for the good of himself, as he is no good. He is bad from beginning, which he ought never to have had, to end, of which there seems to be none to him. He stole money in Seattle, and, playing the baby act, wept himself out of the scrape, drowning his sorrow in the self-same tears. He killed Plouf with impunity because Plouf had no friends and was generally known as a fakir, who swore him a lady-killer and a great dealer in family skeletons. But McGaughey will not be cleared by any eloquence this time. His record is so shadowy that doubtless he will yet find himself permanently in the shade.

WHEN they inducted Mr. Bushnell into the chair of Governor of Ohio the other day, he started a new political plan. From a heart overflowing with gratitude to Napoleon McKinley for his nomination and election, he closed his inaugural address with the hope that the people of the whole country would be able to enjoy the benediction of his services at the head of the Government. The Governor needn't get ill from anxiety lest the people will not be able to know to whom to pay the President's salary. Bill McKinley made quite trouble enough for the country with his McKinley Bill, and the people will think once or twice before accepting Governor Bushnell's nomination of a man whose work in Congress they overwhelmingly repudiated as soon as they got a chance. If any new reason has, since then, arisen for making McKinley President, the news of it has not yet reached this Coast.

THE master vice of the age has been discovered, dragged from its hiding place and exposed to a scandalized and trembling world. Brother Bovard, the Headless Horseman of Reform, is the discoverer, and the vice is playing for drink tickets in the social clubs of Alameda. When an Alamedan has put half a dozen drink tickets into his pocket to steal away his brains, and reels home thus loaded to his shrieking wife and wailing children, the spectacle is said to be enough to move to shudders any beholder. Yet there are compensations. The drink ticket makes business for Alameda. That is to say, since Brother Bovard raised his voice against this fearful sapper of virtue and domestic happiness, parties are made up in San Francisco to go over and hear him preach and have a look at him. And the San Franciscan increases the town's revenue by buying drinks at the saloons.

SENSE AND SENTIMENT.

THE Dutch Boers of South Africa are doubtless a worthy people, and it is natural enough that the world in general should view with a sorrowful indignation their hardships at the hands of the English. They are pitied very much as the world pities the Indians, who have perished under the feet of advancing American civilization. The Boer is not a savage, of course, but he is a hold-over from the past, an agricultural Silurian. That he should have forced upon him the choice of accepting the conditions of modern life or disappearing is hard, but it is inevitable. He has no more chance otherwise of surviving than the Spaniards and native Californians had out here when the discovery of gold brought a race of men who were their superiors in energy. Indeed, the parallel between the state of things in California in 1849 and that now existing in South Africa is very close. Cecil Rhodes may not be a man who approves himself to the minds of the righteous, but no one has denied him the possession of brains. He pictures the situation thus: "Within the Transvaal there are 70,000 new-comers and an old population of 14,000. With the development of the gold industry to a fuller extent the new-comers will number 500,000 in five years, and eventually they will increase to 1,000,000, and probably more. From time to time the position will be upset by the attempts of the new population to claim common civil rights, which eventually they certainly must get." That is simply good sense. Substitute a northern State of Mexico for the Transvaal. Suppose that in Sonora the Americans owned more than half the soil and nine-tenths of the wealth—as is the case with the new-comers in the Transvaal—and how long would Sonora remain a Mexican State if the Americans were refused the ballot and compelled to pay five-sixths of the taxes? Does any American think that Sonora would not produce a Houston, as Texas did, and as South Africa has produced a Jameson?

Americans are getting off altogether wrong about this African business. Of course it was reprehensible for Jameson to raid the Boers, but then it was as natural as fate. And the truth has to be confessed that it is by the perpetration of such wrongs that civilization makes its progress. They tell for right, for better things, in the end, precisely as the grabbing of lands from the Indians on this continent has done. If the Boers are to be upheld, then the Transvaal will be a reservation of backwardness. Somebody has to give way when such a strain comes, and it will have to be the Boers. They cannot expect to stand out permanently against the forces which are beating up against their conservatism. The most that is asked of them is that they shall cease to be dogs in the manger, and accommodate themselves to the new life that has come to surround them, as it came to surround the equally pious, industrious, and slow-going Mormons of Utah. Americans above all others, Cecil Rhodes points out, are insistent upon civil rights for themselves. In the Transvaal, he adds, all the mine managers are Americans.

The Boers are fine fighters, President Kruger is a heroic figure, and it is sad, unquestionably, that a bustling, eager, greedy, improving and elevating civilization should in its march have reached the calm and plodding and unambitious settlers. But that is simply their luck. They must either join the procession or go under. None would be readier to make them understand that than Americans, if the Boers happened to stand in the way of American enterprise.

John Bull at His Best. Three weeks ago the average American was conscious of a ferocious desire to dismember the British Empire and obliterate England from the map. To-day the average American is conscious of a warming of the heart toward Albion and a desire to express sympathy and admiration for her. He is ready to fight over the Monroe Doctrine, and he does not approve of Dr. Jameson's raid, but it does his soul good to see how instant and hot was England's response to the insult and challenge of the German Emperor.

When that insult was offered and all Europe yelled its exultant approval, Englishmen were for the moment still. Then they rose, and their Government showed how well it is prepared for war, and how ready to meet the country's enemies on land or sea, occasion demanding. The German bluff has been called, the young Emperor, the clanking of whose scabbard intoxicates him, humiliated and made ridiculous before mankind, and England holds her head up, defiant and triumphant.

Americans better than any other people can understand just how Englishmen feel just now, for, after all, Americans are but modified Englishmen, notwithstanding the olla-podrida of races that inhabit the republic. It does not need that one should approve of the cause of her quarrel in order to respect the resolution and pluck with which England turned on a hostile world. The nation's back was against the wall and her sword flashed out. The English met the crisis as a brave man would, prepared to fight and fall in his tracks rather than parley.

So it is because England has shown again how masculine her people are, how prompt to stand to their guns when danger threatens, that Americans feel now a new sense of kinship with them, and a pleasure in their victory over a situation which for some days looked very black. The Englishman has his faults that irritate the American, but he is a fighter. Brother Jonathan shakes hands with John Bull in congratulation. That little matter as to Venezuela can wait. The present business is to acknowledge that the old manly British spirit is as fresh and healthy as ever it was.

The City Disgraced.

If the outside world judges San Francisco by her newspapers, the city is being sorely damaged at present. A theological controversy is raging in print of a sort that might reasonably be looked for, once in a way, in some backward Canadian town or Irish village. One not acquainted with the real state of the public mind here would think, on seeing not merely the columns but the whole pages which are given to the output of the inflamed disputants, that San Francisco is divided into two hostile religious camps, ready to fall to with shillalahs at any moment. As a matter of fact, neither the intelligent few nor the bulk of the many care anything about the pious shindy. It does not even amuse the average San Franciscan, for the debaters are too long-winded to be listened to with any special attention. The actual combatants are a fiery priest and a few wooden-beaded parsons. Each side has its partisans, of course, but altogether they number but an insignificant fraction of the population. Neither the ordinary Catholic nor the ordinary Protestant, nor the ordinary man who is without religious belief, is stirred. He has his living to make, and in his leisure something better to do than to wade through oceans of clerical bile. The fear, or rather the wish, expressed by the belligerents that rioting may presently ensue is grotesque. Half a dozen policemen could handle all the men in San Francisco who want to fight in testimony of the ardor of their love of God and hatred of one another.

If the dull bigots of the A. P. A. and the incensed Father Yorke are to blame for the stupid and utterly discreditable controversy, what shall we say of the newspapers which have furnished them a battle-field and made San Francisco ridiculous and contemptible in the eyes of the country? The motive of these newspapers is to the last degree shameful. Under pretense of "giving the news," they published every insult that the A. P. A. orators at their meetings flung at the Catholics. They did this unwillingly, but feared to offend the A. P. A. by not doing it. Then when Father Yorke drew his pen and came back at his church's maligners, the editors were afraid to refuse him space lest the Catholics should be affronted. The A. P. A. is an organization of unknown size, and to disoblige it might mean a loss of subscribers; the Catholic church is a powerful body, and to disoblige it might be to forfeit nickels. So these catchpenny papers have been carried along by their cowardice and love of money until their pages reek with everything that excited sectarians can write in one another's dispraise, and the city is made to seem on the verge of a St. Patrick's Day insurrection. A notion of San Francisco's intellectual calibre is given to the stranger that must mortify every civilized person within its limits.

Three things are made clear by this most un-Christian Christian exchange of stink-pots. One is that the A. P. A. of San Francisco, with its imported Canadian zealots like the Rev. Ross, has become a nuisance of magnitude which needs sitting on quite as hard as did the Irish Catholic in politics who gave it an excuse for coming into existence. Another is that Archbishop Riordan would consult the dignity and welfare of his church by restraining the hot tempered among his priests. The third is that we are cursed with newspapers which prove themselves to be as devoid of concern for the city's good fame as they are conscienceless and incapable in their management.

The intelligence and character of San Francisco can be trusted, we think, to deal justly in due time with all the parties to this equally scandalous and surprising outbreak of fanaticism. When election day comes any head marked A. P. A. or Catholic that shows itself and asks for votes on account of its brand, will be hit, and hit hard. As for the newspapers which have trucked to the medieval survivals engaged in the godly battle, they have other subscribers than the followers of Preacher Ross and Father Yorke. These should show their detestation of such vile journalism by taking only the newspapers which have held aloof from the fray. Were five per cent. of the modern men of common sense in this community to adopt that course we should have an end of such controversies in the press, which is as craven as it is thrifty. Every citizen has an interest, and a vital one, in protecting the town's reputation. San Francisco is a sane and exceptionally liberal city, where a man's religious belief counts neither for nor against him, and it is not to be borne that a few preachers, priests, and newspapers should spread abroad the misconception that theological fights form one of our principal occupations.

Police Detectives. Perhaps the greatest bumbags in this city —if there can be any greater than the ministers—are the police detectives. You are robbed. You rush off to the detectives and tell them about it. At the same time you tell them the names and addresses of the robbers, and where they generally deposit their swag. The gentlemanly detectives put on their kid gloves, light their cigars, take their canes, doff their silk hats and go to the persons named and the places designated, and if you were correct in the information you gave them, they recover the stuff. You are notified of the recovery, and after forgetting to demand the whole of your loss, you thank the detectives, thank God for the protection of an intelligent police detective force, and retire to your home. The newspapers the next day, by that mysterious clairvoyance by which they see and know everything, spread wide the knowledge of the skill, acuteness, penetration, sagacity, shrewdness, and so forth, and so forth, of the police, and make you half ashamed that you did not leave them all the plunder as a reward for such wonderful talents. But if you do not know the robbers and the other appertinent details, you do not tell them to the detectives, they do not recover the goods, and the newspaper columns are as empty as the brain of the detectives. But we are perhaps not altogether just,—that is, not just to Truth. Sometimes, with all the clue in the world needful to do their work, with even a part of the plunder recovered from the place the robbers had hidden it, the certainty that the thieves would come back to get it, they blunder and make such a botch of it that they wear out Patience herself with their immeasurable stupidity, and with a dense ignorance and lack of common wit, let the thieves escape with the rest of their boodle. When the history of the great detectives of San Francisco is written hereafter, there will be no mention made of the Ingleside robbery and how the robbers were caught. And yet the great Lees will pose still as a successful detective, and will go to his grave clothed in the happy conceit that he has wit enough to go in when it rains, though no one else ever detected it in him.

A Mirror Of The Public Mind. The sensational character of the journalism of the day is well illustrated by the manner in which our great dailies have dropped a number of the subjects that for a time filled their pages with so-called news. But a few months ago Durrant was good for a page or two each day, and sometimes more. Then came the scandal over the arrest of a lecherous old man and his associates. That was made the basis of an attempt to agitate the public mind, and a call was printed to the "Mothers of San Francisco" to assemble in the Police Court, in order that the grasp of the law might be tightened on the alleged offenders. Recently the First Congregational Church scandal bobbed up, and the press has already surfeited the public with the unsavory details. And so it goes. Such is the love of sensation and scandal mongering in our newspapers, that when one finds a subject of serious and permanent interest taken up industriously by them, he may be assured that it is a dull time for what is called "news." Of course the city editors and the managing editors have to live up to the conditions which the publishing interest has imposed. The newspaper is no longer to be regarded as an advocate of principles, but is simply a money-making enterprise, doing more or less good incidentally, but never hesitating from mere considerations of public morality or propriety from inflicting an infinite amount of mischief. The more sensational and the more scandalous the intelligence that may reach the office of one of our dailies the more certain is its publication. This sort of highly-seasoned gossip the appetite of the public calls for, and the publishers are scarcely to be blamed for giving the people what the people seem to want. The newspaper criterion of taste and expediency is circulation. If any given piece of "news" helps to "sell the paper," that is all the journalistic conductors wish to know. The more salacious the details, the greater the avidity manifested by the public to get at the "news." The "editor-in-chief," who was formerly the great man of journalism, is nowadays a myth. Few persons of intelligence care a rap for the opinions expressed in the so-called editorial columns of the daily papers, well knowing that every utterance of those columns is controlled by the proprietary notion of what will best suit the public, or the particular class, political or otherwise, to whose prejudices or interests it is the policy of the journal to cater. Such is our modern journalism, marvelous in its enterprise and almost photographic in the fidelity and the celerity in which it holds the mirror up to nature. In it the public may see the reflection of their own faults and follies. This is, in truth, a scandal-loving age, and it must be said, in justice to the press, that deplorably vicious and meretricious as it is, it yet is at times a powerful agent for reform; always a terrible police power more feared than the arm of the law; a zealous and influential friend of every worthy charity, and the most potent of all restraints upon rascality in office and every form of organized deceit and fraud.

The Greenback and the Gold Reserve. The weak spot in our national finances is the possibility that at some distant day the free coinage of silver may be allowed by law, or that silver may be offered in payment of the United States bonds outstanding. Were it not for this haunting fear of the financial world, there would be no utilization of greenbacks to draw gold from the Treasury, and no difficulty would exist regarding the maintenance of a gold reserve. While this irrepressible silver spectre will not down at the bidding of any administration or school of finance, there yet remains another source of alarm in the reissue of greenbacks. It is high time for the Government of the United States to go out of the banking business, which has brought upon the country a multitude of disasters. It was supposed by the founders of the Government that the constitution prohibited, by implication, all issues of paper money. But the civil war made a resort to paper a military necessity, and what a great national emergency created a sense of expediency has since suffered to exist. Unquestionably, President Cleveland has given good advice regarding the greenback: the days of its usefulness have long passed, and it should be permanently retired. National banks, which are in reality strictly private enterprises, doing business under restraints and safeguards imposed by Congress, may be depended upon to supply all the paper money needed for the convenience of trade and commerce. And with such amendments in the banking laws as have from time to time been suggested, the circulation of the national bank notes would be sufficiently elastic to conform itself to the varying wants of business, in accordance with the changes of the seasons, the movement of crops, and the tendency towards prosperity in trade or otherwise. In short, national bank notes may be made to constitute a safe and adequate paper currency, while leaving ample room for the enlarged circulation of coin, either gold or silver, as the inclinations or convenience of the public might dictate. Certainly the business men of the nation are thoroughly disgusted with the present condition of the national finances, and the continued resort to issues of bonds to replenish the reserve of gold. It is practically like pouring water into a sieve. And while the administration seems to be forced into a continuance of this artifice, which is admitted to be nothing more than a temporary relief, the manner in which the sale of bonds has been managed has naturally excited much adverse criticism. Congress ought to settle the entire difficulty by some wholesome and radical legislation, but with silver men in control of the Senate any permanent relief seems well-nigh hopeless at this time. The best that can be done just now is to call attention to the vicious and unpatriotic course of the free-silver Senators, who have taken advantage of a time of popular unrest and national exigency to attempt to force their preposterous propositions upon an unwilling people. The free coinage agitation has subsided everywhere but in the silver States and Territories and the Senate of the United States, where the champions of the depreciated metal are strongly entrenched.

A Common Excuse for Wife Murder. Charles L. Hill, who murdered his wife in Oakland the other day, declares that he was moved to do the deed by "family troubles," and that just before he shot her she had told him something that "no man would listen to quietly." But he refuses to go into particulars, saying that he "will not drag her name down." If Hill thinks that he can win public sympathy by thus insinuating a cause that he declines to openly charge, he is greatly mistaken. An open accusation of infidelity against his wife would be far more manly, as well as more credible, than this devious sort of impeachment. But whether he had provocation or not, his slaying of his wife was in any case a brutal and inexcusable murder. Public opinion should frown upon such crimes of violence, no matter on what pretext they may be committed. Infidelity is no excuse for murder, although at times the circumstances may be of such a character as to mitigate the offense. Sensible people must be aware that the toleration of wife-murder on the ground of adultery is to afford to the perpetrators of that crime of violence a ready excuse for the act. A jealous fool of a husband may first slay and then invent a story of his wife's shame and confession. The death of the best witness against him makes such falsehood easy, and little liable to detection, and with this foundation to build upon susceptible juries are easily "worked" by artful attorneys. It must be conceded, on sober examination, that the too-common extenuation of wife-murder on the plea of infidelity, is not in accordance with sound reasoning or a healthful sentiment. No doubt some men are spurred to the commission of a crime, which otherwise they would recoil from with horror, by the idea that the public expect and approve of vengeance in some form in cases where the domestic "happiness" has been destroyed. There is, it appears, some remnant of this barbarous sentiment in communities otherwise regarded as advanced and civilized. The evil and the folly of this notion is best exhibited by the manner in which it is made the excuse or justification of such atrocious acts as that of which Charles L. Hill is guilty. In this country the laws afford a plain and sufficiently speedy remedy to any husband who finds his confidence betrayed. And when once the door is opened to any other than the lawful remedy, the innocent are quite as apt to suffer as the guilty.

The Button-Pressers Of The Present Day. Perhaps at no time in the history of the world have the fortunes of nations been more subject to the arbitrary will of individuals than at the present day. In the days of Alexander or of the Cæsars the arbitrament of war or peace was scarcely more a subject of individual caprice or personal ambition than it is now in the time of the Emperor William of Germany, of Prime Minister Salisbury of England and President Cleveland of the United States. We saw, not long ago, how the President of this republic, circumscribed as it is with all the forms of a written constitution, by the mere stroke of his pen almost precipitated the two greatest nations of Christendom into a war whose far-reaching consequences no man could foresee. And but the other day the irritable and ambitious Emperor of Germany impulsively flashed to a remote African dependency of Great Britain a message that roused all Europe as though it were a trumpet call to arms. A score of men could be named, any one of whom has it at all times in his power to destroy the peace of Europe, or plunge the entire civilized world into the horrors of war. We have been wont to boast in this country of the restraints provided by our constitution—and the wisdom of its framers, in reserving to Congress the sole power to declare war, has often been commended. But in a twinkling that delusion has been banished. It is now perceived that with a strong popular sentiment at his back, the President of the United States has only to say the word for war, and Congress becomes the echo of his decree; the mere instrument of his will. Not more absolute, in reality, is the power of the Czar of Russia to let loose the dogs of war than is that of the President of the United States. The chief difference is that the President must feel assured that the people are with him, while the Czar is at least nominally free from restraint. Yet, as a matter of fact, it is highly improbable that the Czar would ever venture upon a war in violation of any strong sentiment of the Russian people. After all that may be said, it can scarcely seem strange that nations which are constantly drilling and preparing for war will some day be at one another's throats. Some ambitious or headstrong individual seizes a propitious moment to press the button of national pride or hatred, and instantly the flame of war bursts forth.

True Meaning of Blackmail. Blackmail is a word popularly used as a term of reproach. It was formerly a purely Highland extortion—a tribute levied by freebooters for the protection of property. It was, in olden times, a tax paid to robbers for security. In modern times, it is a bribe tendered by sinners to garrulous people whose mouths can be bound only with bits of gold, to secure a good name to which the owner is not entitled. It is rarely or never paid by people who have nothing to fear. When the extortion is believed to be too great, the victim squeals and cries out "blackmail," and pretends to be virtuous, and puts on airs of innocence, and hopes to cow the scoundrel who has been making the levy. This generally succeeds in frightening the other party into silence and self-banishment. Sometimes it does not. We all know a case in which it did not. That was because the blackmailer was just the same kind of a hypocrite as the blackmailee. She had a short-lived reputation, but no character, to lose. She went for spoil, and didn't intend to be bluffed. She was playing a big game. If she does not win, she knows the other fellow will lose, and that for her will be a victory. She will be five hundred dollars ahead, and they will both go to hell together, both quoting scripture, both uttering prayers, both sanctimoniously and piously showing the whites of their eyes. If, after this exhibition of what goes on in the lives of ministers and Sunday school teachers, the religion of Christ isn't cheapened and degraded and the worship of the devil held less censurable, we'll never prophecy any more.

The leaders of the Cuban rebels have shown good generalship so far, in their plans of campaign against the Spanish forces. It must have been a great temptation to the revolutionists, at times, to engage in regular battle with the troops of Spain. But, beyond question, the wiser policy is to harass and annoy the regulars, rather than to meet them squarely in the open field, where the latter would have every advantage. General Gomez and his fellow-leaders are exhibiting a sagacity that promises ultimate success, if their present plans be maintained. The yellow fever, as they truly say, is a worse enemy to the soldiers of Spain than the bullets or machetes of the insurrectionists.

BRIGHT WOMEN OF THE SWIM.

THERE is an element in our social life in San Francisco which cannot be surpassed by the oldest cities of our country, and that is the intellectual attainments of some of our women. It would be impossible in this space to do full justice to all the bright women who have and yet do adorn our society, but to enumerate a few will readily prove the assertion made above. We are not alluding to the strictly "clever" woman, the new woman, or the pedantic woman, but to the brilliant minds and cultivated mental gifts of the woman who is equally a society woman.

Mrs. John F. Swift, the President of the Century Club, is eminently one of this kind. Of commanding presence, combining great beauty with dignity of manner, a progressive thinker and most agreeable conversationalist, she shines alike as hostess in her beautiful home or in presiding over the councils of the Century Club.

Another beautiful woman equally gifted is Mrs. Henry Gibbons, wife of one of our leading physicians. Mrs. Gibbons is a bright feature of the Century Club (of which she has been President). She is ever foremost in all that pertains to the advancement and education of her sex, and her efforts in behalf of the Mercantile Library are noteworthy. Yet withal she is most womanly and refined, nothing of the "strong-minded female" being apparent in her sparkling conversation.

Miss Mary Lake, principal of the girls' school bearing her name, is a clever woman of much originality of thought, her mode of expressing the same being reminiscent of her father, the late Judge Delos Lake. She comes of a bright family, her sister Annie Lake having essayed the rôle of novelist before she married the author of "Chimmie Fadden," E. W. Townsend.

Mrs. Buckingham, nee Eldridge, a member of the Century Club, is of a more severe cast than any of the above mentioned women. She is more of the Boston style. Mrs. Buckingham is much given to charitable and church work also.

Mrs. Horace Davis, wife of the well known merchant, is a recognized light in the Century Club, a woman far above the average in quickness of perception, literary knowledge and inheriting from her father—the late Starr King—the same bappy faculty of expression in conveying that knowledge to others.

Mrs. Horace Ewing is well known as a bright woman, of much executive ability, whose advice is always eagerly sought and followed by her associates in club or society work for the advancement of women.

Miss Laura McKinstry is a young woman of exceptional mental powers, her bright mind and sarcastic wit having gained her the reputation of being the brightest young lady in society. Miss Laura has a keen sense of the ridiculous, and at a glance seems to perceive the shams of the day. Tall and slender, with brown hair and eyes, she is an attractive as well as clever feature of our social world.

Miss West, of the West Seminary for young ladies, is a woman of strong character and much culture.

One of society's handsomest girls is Miss Kate Jarboe, who is also one of the cleverest. Our community will soon lose this bright young woman, however, as marriage with an Eastern journalist will rob us of her charming presence. Miss Jarboe has turned her attention to literary work during the last two years, and bids fair to achieve success therein.

Mrs. Frank Pixley is another lady who combines social distinction with great executive ability in club life and eburch or charitable work.

Mrs. Dr. Burgess is a lady of bright intellectual powers and conversational charm, possessing a mind enriched by extended foreign travel and contact with the prominent people of other countries, as well as her own. She is also an earnest worker in church and charitable undertakings.

Mrs. David Bixler in a large degree unites the society hostess with the bright intellectual attainments entitling her to the name of a clever woman. She is much interested in art, and always ready to patronize either music or painting, her home on Pine street being a temple of both.

Miss Anna Head, the fiancée of Lieutenant Jephson, of South African fame, is a young lady whose mental gifts have been still further enhanced by culture and foreign travel. She is of a strong literary bent, and remarkably well informed in the literature of the day, making her a most charming conversationalist as well as attractive member of society.

The brilliant achievements in social and artistic life of Mrs. M. H. DeYoung give her front rank among our bright women. Her mental capacity is abnormal, her mind being quick and retentive; her personal charm is so great it may be termed magnetic. Mrs. De Young is a supporter of art in all its branches, while no worthy charitable work appeals to her in vain.

Of course, this is but a tithe of the bright women of our city, but as examples of brilliant social and literary culture combined they certainly take leading positions.

AT THE CROSS.

"YOU will go with me to-morrow?"

"Yes, to the end of the world!"

She regarded him with dark eyes full of sombre fire. "Why should I not go with you?" she asked, in tones full of plaintive misery. "Have I not loved you all my life long? Why should I continue to live with a brute simply because a mortal man has spoken mortal words above our joined hands?"

He clasped her to his breast and covered her face with burning kisses.

"My love, my life, my own!" he murmured, with tremulous incoherence; and then kneeling down at her feet, he buried his rapturous face in the folds of her redolent garments.

Her robes, the room, the luxurious chair that contained the marvelous beauty of her form were all of a daffodil hue and it seemed to him that he was floating heavenward in the golden glory of dawn.

It was she who broke the mellow silence.

"I shall take the child," she said, in a tone denoting former discussion.

"It is his child, too," he answered bitterly.

"Yes, but he is not her mother."

"But will it be well for her to—" he checked himself.

She covered her face with her hands and sobbed aloud.

"Even at this hour," she moaned, "you can think how it will be for her in the future."

He tried to comfort her with assurances and caresses, but she tore herself from his arms, and, rising to her full, proud height, she stepped to the door of her boudoir and parting the soft draperies, entered therein.

An ormolu clock ticked softly in the semi-darkness and the room had a fragrance as palpitant as a gentle shower of violets.

She approached the little bed that contained this flower life. She drew aside the muslin curtains and looked upon her child who lay with upturned face and white arms outstretched.

She stood, white, transfixed, with eyes sad and steadfast as Fate's.

He had followed her and when her gaze rested upon him he grew cold and still as one in the presence of death.

She broke the stillness in a voice as clear and solemn as vesper bells.

"See!" she said, pointing to the sleeping child; "her form has made the shape of the cross in her sleep, but it shall be my crucifixion, not hers. I will not go with you to-morrow."

He kissed her cold hands and departed like one stricken dumb.

She knelt down by the window and looked out at the stars.

To her eyes, the heavens were filled with a great radiance, and in its midst she saw Christ on Calvary, not thorn crowned and speat with anguish, but radiant, sublime, as he cried in a voice of holy triumph, "Suffer little children to come unto me."—MAUDE ANDREWS in The Bohemian.

ONE of the saddest telegrams for her host of friends was the message conveying the news of the death of Mrs. Theresa Josephine Corlette, in Milan, Italy, December 17th last, from congestion of the brain. Mrs. Corlette arrived in this city from New Zealand in 1875, and shortly after was engaged as special correspondent for the Chronicle. Her work on the Post also won her success, but she was best known for her fashion department in the News Letter under the signature of "Silver Pen." In 1890 the lady took her daughter Ethel to Paris for a first-class musical education, and later on to Italy, where she passed away. She leaves five children to mourn her loss. Miss Ethel Corlette has had the body cremated in Milan, and will return with the sacred ashes.

CALIFORNIA PRODUCTION CO.,

SOME time ago, I mean to say a few weeks ago, I went to see George Edwards (I think it is George Edwards, if not, I beg his pardon) company in The Shop Girl. There is a very clever little woman called Connie Ediss who does ample justice to Harry Dam's libretto, and who sings a song peculiarly appealing just now. Some Californians who were with me looked startled when the song began, and although I am still in the dark as to the cause of their mirth, their unseemly mirth, I must admit I found the song most amusing. But there is something back of it, and I frankly state I would like to know what it is. The song goes:

Oh, Moses! it was cold.

Left in a basket tied with twine;

Oh, Jerusalem! it was chilly."

But the "Oh, Moses, it was cold" is a refrain one cannot help echoing, for we are in the middle of a bizzard, and the present weather has broken the January record for twenty-five years. It is in fact so freezing that the paper I write on is like ice under my hand, and I am shivering although not two feet away from an open fire. I am quite convinced that it is freezing, not roasting, which is the fate of condemned sinners. I have wondered why any one who can escape lingers in New York, but people do stay nevertheless.

Dr. Younger and Aleck Daly have been at the Hoffman for a short time. Mrs. Younger sailed for Europe last Saturday. Miss Elizabeth Strong is one of the Californians who is making a distinct name for herself in artistic circles here. She has a charming studio in the Rembrandt, where her Saturday afternoon teas are events in the world of artists. The "Rembrandt" is next door to the Carnegie studio building, where Theodore Wores has his studio, and is the artistic home of Childe Hassam, Frederic Remington, Sargent, Rossiter, and a score of well-known artists.

I am amused at the New York position of a certain well-known San Francisco family. Their Californian supremacy is absolutely ignored, and they are known simply as "the people who were over in Japan," "the St. Louis Hicks," or "the people who had a stunning daughter at Mrs. Reed's." I must say it is discouraging to a Californian to find Californian leadership so indifferent to Eastern minds. But if they recognized any Californian leader they should surely recognize Mrs. Hager, who is the most generous and kindly hostess, and who, whatever may be said to the contrary, I personally have never known as anything but sincere, loyal, and entirely above worldly considerations in the choice of friends.

Mr. de Gierville, the talented war correspondent of the Herald, is in New York, and is making himself popular with stories of his experiences in the country of the little people. Some of them are familiar, but are made original by his clever method.

The Journal is becoming a paper to be remarked, but any one interested in California will pray that Mr. Hearst may take a higher standard. He, as an individual, has proven so dignified, so capable, so balanced, that one cannot but recognize his great ability. It is a pity if he means to establish here, as he did in San Francisco, a merely money-making sheet. He is too clever. Bennett is a fine model and understands the medium between sensationalism and respectability. Mrs. Hearst, who is rarely referred to in the papers, unless her beauty and her diamonds share the notice, has just given five thousand dollars to the Children's Hospital in Washington as part of a bequest of her late husband, who designated an important sum to this use. Such a notice of Mrs. Hearst seems more familiar to us of the West, who are used to thinking of her as not only beautiful and decorative, but as generous, charitable, tender and sympathetic.

Mrs. Ogden Mills has just returned from abroad, and is, as usual, entertaining lavishly.

I wrote you of the unhappiness in the Ratcliffe ménage. The two met before the Judge for the trial of their divorce case, wept, went out and lunched together, and "made up." The astonishment of the Judge was only equalled by his delight at seeing "married folks agree," which is rare in his court.

ONE of the substantial institutions of the United States is the ancient and honorable insurance company, the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, Richard A. McCurdy, President. No insurance corporation has a better character for honor and justice than the Mutual Life. While by its wise and conservative business management its investments have yielded an immense profit to the policy-holders, it has made it a constant policy to be the first company to settle a risk, frequently even when there was a question in dispute. Mr. A. B. Forbes, the agent for the Pacific coast, has done all in his power to maintain the company's good name and fame in California and upon the Pacific Coast, and the Mutual Life Insurance Company now occupies the same leading position on this continent it has so long occupied throughout the other parts of the United States. The company has its own splendid building and offices at 222 Sansome street, corner of California street, where all information will be given to those requiring safe and solid life insurance protection.

THE greatest auction sale of centrally located real estate in San Francisco that has occurred for a long time will take place next Thursday, Jan. 25th, when Baldwin & Hammond, the well-known real estate firm, will dispose at public sale of the splendid property of the Pacific Improvement Company, involving Residence and business lots, with the excessively low terms of one-fourth cash and the balance in one, two and three years, with interest at seven per cent. per annum on deferred payments. The property includes seventy splendid lots at the gore of Valencia and Market, beside others in Jessie and Stevenson, Valencia and Castro streets. Out by the park 5 lovely villa lots at Stanyan and Waller streets will be disposed of.

Cod-liver oil is something more than a fat. Its peculiar action depends on a number of substances, among which might be mentioned iodine and phosphorus. There can be no substitute for cod-liver oil, because there is no other oil known which has in natural combination with it such a large number of valuable medicinal agents.

Scott's Emulsion

of Cod-liver Oil, with the hypophosphites contains the whole oil, with its natural properties, and in a thoroughly emulsified or digested condition. The hypophosphites increase the appetite and impart strength to the nervous system. This combination has marked curative properties in a number of diseases of the skin and scalp, to which scrofulous persons are peculiarly liable. Such diseases as chronic eczema, ringworm, and other skin affections, are often quickly cured by the constitutional effects following the use of Scott's Emulsion.

SCOTT & BOWNE, Chemists, New York.

COULD it have been a resolve to do her mite for the American drama that prompted Marie Wainwright's choice of The Daughters of Eve? If so, what a pity that some work fairly representative of American play-writing brains could not have had the benefit of her patriotism. That it is a safer and more interesting investment by far to witness Miss Wainwright in the plays of an author securely dead and famous—both of which boons are, strange to chronicle, withheld from the Lancaster-Magnus combination—was evidenced Monday evening at the Baldwin, when Sheridan Knowles' rare old comedy, The Love Chase, was given a delightful presentation. The atmosphere of symmetry and grace, the spirit of a bygone politeness and picturesque deportment hovers about every word and action of this quaint comedy treasure. The happy termination of the amusing complications, where the wand of some good fairy seems to lend its aid to the good, old-fashioned finale, is as refreshing as a breath of country air in the spring-time. Mr. Maguus, he of The Daughters of Eve, has written an epilogue which Miss Wainwright addresses in a winningly confidential way to the audience and players. It is a pretty idea and neatly done, but not half so effective as the bonne bouche that closed our childhood's tales: "And they lived happily ever afterwards."

Marie Wainwright makes a sparkling Constance. The silvery quality of her cheery voice and the charm of a vivacious, mettlesome presence give a ring of sincerity to her comedy parts that is not always in the same true sympathy with severer roles. Her Constance is an adorable and womanly woman; imperious, tender; blithesome, reflective; wistfully affectionate and ardently jealous—a felicitous combination of all the sweet contradictions component of woman's loveliness. She gowns Constance in a series of wondrous creations which tender young things call "dreams" "poems" and "symphonies"; gowns beautiful and startling, if baser man may meekly sing their excellence. The entire performance is full of color and gentle merriment. Barton Hill's easy elegance of manner makes an ideal Foullove. There is a rhythmic breadth of gesture inseparable from Mr. Hill that makes him invaluable for these parts in which the old school of acting stands unexcelled. Wildrake was a great improvement on Mr. Hartwig's acting of last week; there being some excuse for strutting and posing. Miss Russell's Widow Green was out of drawing; it was more the Katisha of modern comic opera than the simpering widow of The Love Chase.

Mr. James's Macbeth is an absorbingly melodramatic one. It could not be otherwise and live up to the accepted traditions of what is a true rendering of the gory Thane. Sir Henry recently presented his imaginative, tensely-strung, gold-armored feud to New York, but the noble army of Shakespearian students and the gentlemen of the press would have none of his sinister, villain-born creation. They clamored for the big, bloody, brutish Macbeth of tradition—the wife-ridden Macbeth who might have died a worthy man but for the devilish ingenuity of his crimson haired spouse; but who, once the spark of ambition had flared into murderous flames, was the great butchering, shuddering monster that stands the gory peer of tragedy and the apex of melodrama. Mr. James's Macbeth seeks no esoteric meaning in the lines that precede his crimes; he enters the stage a man of fairly wholesome parts; he dies fierce but distracted, and glad to leave behind the intolerable burden of bleak, soul-shivering remorse. Nature has fashioned Louis James well for the part both in voice and person. He rants because a Macbeth must rant to be within the borders of probability; but he rants discreetly—delicately, I should say, could such a dainty word be applied to a proceeding so violent. Miss Kruger's Lady Macbeth was bravely played and reflects favorably on the versatility of such a young actress. Of course it had not the force and savage intensity vital to a thorough conception of this great tragic role, but it made an excellent foil for the star and displayed a generous promise for the maturer Miss Kruger that a few years time will give us. Macduff was over-done at every point by Mr. Lindsay. His final scene was ruined by an over-acted violence that approached hysteria.

The only performance of Othello during Mr. James's engagement at the California was given Tuesday night to a fine audience. Mr. James makes a splendid Moor; physique, intellectual appreciation and deep, sonorous voice have achieved a distinction for his Othello greater than that of any living American actor. With the scenic environment such as the brains and capital of an Irving could supply and an adequate supporting company, Mr. James could reap a fortune from performances of Othello and Hamlet alone. He is not an actor great enough to compel universal recognition in the modest surroundings of his present equipment, but with his unmistakable tragic powers augmented by the support of first-class fellow players and the wondrous adjuncts possible to the stage of to-day, he would sooner find the place that is his right in the dramatic annals of the end of the nineteenth century. Louis James is an agreeable and highly intelligent exponent of several of Shakespeare's great characters. His initial season as an unattached star displays none of the showman's art in stage effects nor in the handling of the ensemble; his company, with the exception of Miss Kruger, is not a good one; but despite these drawbacks Mr. James has played San Francisco two weeks of the legitimate and increased a hundred fold the good favor in which he is held here.

The Senator, with the possible exception of Sydney Grundy's Arabian Nights, displays the Frawley players to the best advantage of any play in their repertory. It is an intensely interesting comedy, and, breathing as it does, the spirit of restless activity and indomitable energy of the American people and mirroring with such fidelity the eventfulness of diplomatic and political life in Washington, it is full of interest and meaning for American audiences—whose opportunities are rare for witnessing good plays written by their countrymen. It is not many months since The Senator was reviewed in these columns, and little that is new can be said for the excellence of the play and its production. Miss Lansing Rowan's Mrs. Armstrong introduced another agreeable actress into Mr. Frawley's ranks. Miss Kennark played Mabel Denman, and though not giving her the matchless dignity and gentle womanhood that made Katherine Grey's Mabel so sweetly gracious in the earlier production, she acts the part in a clean, intelligent manner. Frawley is peerless in his character of the wooden lieutenant; Blakemore's Ling Ching is the same droll, gentlemanly Celestial. Blanche Bates never did a prettier piece of acting than Mrs. Hillary, and Maclyn Arbuckle's Senator Rivers has become a part of local theatrical history.

Sedley Brown's pastoral drama, A Long Lane, while not so full of heroism and adventure as most of the plays staged at the Grand, has excellently displayed the aptitude of Mr. Morosco's players for work requiring quiet depth. Next week, for the first time in San Francisco, James Haskin's sensational melodrama, The Man Without a Country, will be produced. A further event will be the first appearance on this stage of Woody Van Dyck, the child star.

Gilmore and Leland, a jovial team of Irish comedians, and William Roberts, another clever specialty artist, are among the new faces at the Orpheum this week. Most of the old favorites of last week have been retained, so the programme is one of much interest for lovers of the variety, and has drawn a big business throughout the week.

The dashing John Philip Sousa and his great band will give several concerts next month at the Mechanics' Pavilion under the direction of Friedlander, Gottlob & Co.

Andrew Bogart's matinee song recital at Golden Gate Hall last Saturday was the only recent event of consequence in music circles. Mr. Bogart sang two Schuman songs, Handel's "Where'er You Walk," and Jago's "Creed from Orléans." As a singer of ballads and songs requiring no great dramatic strength, Mr. Bogart stands pre-eminent in San Francisco, his method is faultless, and his voice has been definitely placed and cultured to an almost liquid purity. He sang the Creed with splendid vehemence and no little idea of its dramatic force; nevertheless, his sphere, undoubtedly, is in a lighter and more romantic vein. A novelty, a duet from Humperdinck's Haus und Garten, was rendered by Mrs. Herte-Mark and Miss Berglund. It does not show any special adaptability for a concert reading, but is brightly frolicsome, and amusing.

A concert for the benefit of the choir fund of Grace Church will be given at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium on Wednesday evening. Besides the choir, the Plymouth Quartette, Miss Mabel Love, and Mrs. Maud Chappelle-Henley will participate. A realization of the excellent work done here in the past by this choir, and the fact that the concert is to aid its maintenance as a permanent organization, should attract a large audience.

The Frawley Company will present The Ensign at the Columbia commencing with Tuesday evening next. The play is a strong, patriotic melodrama, full of exciting situations, and as the American flag plays a prominent part in its story, will doubtless have an enthusiastic reception, coming now at a time when the public pulse is running high over rumors of war. It was excellently produced last season by these favorite players.

The Alcazar will next week see a presentation of Leonard Grover's sensational melodrama, The Wolves of New York. It will be realistically staged in every particular; the scenes of the oil works, the burning tank, and the hoisting machinery, making most impressive adjuncts. The cast is nearly the same as that at Stockwell's last year, where the piece enjoyed a run of four weeks.

In Old Kentucky, one of the successes of this decade, and the play which introduced the famous Pickaninny Band, the race of five thoroughbreds on the Lexington track, and many other novelties, comes next week to the California. It is distinctly an American play, and pictures Kentucky life with the true blue grass flavor. Miss Laura Burt, the original Madge, comes with the company.

Otto Bendix will give a piano recital at Beethoven Hall on Wednesday evening. Mr. Bendix added materially to a slack season of music by his former recitals, displaying remarkable powers as an interpreter of the greatest of piano literature, and his initial recital of this season will doubtless be largely attended.

Next week will be the fifth and last of Ixion at the Tivoli. A new batch of songs and specialties will garnish the production. The Gentle Savage, a new American opera, said to be of excellent plot and melody, will follow.

Marie Wainwright closes her engagement at the Baldwin Sunday night. The theatre will remain closed for two weeks, when the Tavery Opera Company commences a season of grand opera.

The people of San Francisco may not realize that the Olympic Salt Water Company expended $400,000 to secure pure ocean water to supply the Lurline Baths. After being pumped into this great bathing establishment it is heated and furnished so that either a tub bath or a swim may be enjoyed in the heart of the city. Tickets for the plunge bath may be had in blocks of 50 tickets, at the rate of 5 for $1. Single tickets for either tub or plunge will remain unchanged, viz.: Single tickets, 30 cents, or four for $1.

The ideal flowers of California bloom all the year round for the most part; but Leopold & Co., on Post street, near the corner of Kearny, observe the seasons in their beautiful nursery, and the result is that our most beautiful violets and roses adorn the debutante "rosebuds" who dance in our winter cotillions.

THE Reverend Mr. Brown, whose name is most irreverently tossed about in the mouths of the ugody, jeered at by wicked men, and flippantly familiar to the lips of dissolute women, has graduated from the tribunal of the examining police magistrate with the degree of N. G. Before he was quite through that interesting ordeal, he omitted, for one occasion only, his usual Sunday task of calling the people of his religious congregation together, and telling them to be good—to do as he said, not as he did. Then he skipped back to his pulpit again, as if nothing had happened. But the deacons are also a lot of self-satisfied folk, who are sometimes nearly as good as the minister, and who have to be reckoned with. One or two of them therefore, as we understand, suggested to him that he had forgotten something. The pious Mrs. Cooper, who never lets the world forget her religiousness, spoke right out about him in terms of sisterly reproach—aye, even worse than that, perchance. Then the deacons quickened his memory. He had forgotten that, in the course of a little private controversy he had lately had with a female graduate from one of the penitentiaries of the East, there had been some considerable public scandal, and he had gotten his Sunday shirt bosom a good deal smutched, and it needed to go through the laundry. So now he has been before the Bay Association of Congregational ministers, and told them he didn't think the spots on his bosom amounted to much, but would submit to examination. Now, then, comes the Ecclesiastical Court, and the investigation, and the calling of witnesses, and the laundry business is to be gone over again. Will these religious people wash their dirty linen in public, or will they do it in whispers? Whatever happens to the Reverend Mr. Brown, he can't come out of it with any worse name than he has now. If the whitewash brush is liberally used, he may come back with his name as white as snow, whereas it is now as dark as his original christening made it.

Sir Northrope Cowles, recently decorated by the Sultan, has been much aggrieved by the strictures upon his royal master, anent the Armenian massacre. Sir Northrope declares that, had the news of those atrocities been wired in time to the Bohemian Club, his chief and worthy colleague, Sir George Hall, the Turkish Consul, would not so long have delayed his departure to Constantinople to see about it, and have the killing peremptorily checked. Abdul Hamid has written confidently to Mr. Cowles, as follows:

My Dear Northrope: Our mutual friend Hall has arrived, and is installed in one of our spare palaces overlooking the Bosphorus, where he has hot and cold water every morning, with all the modern conveniences. I will send you by the next mail a photograph of George in turban and burnous. I can tell you he looks stunning. The odalisques are quite taken with Sir George, and that little chanson of his, "Papa Sachina," has been translated into Arabic for the benefit of the ladies of my harem. George, I am glad to inform you, is very discreet, and, indeed, it will be to his advantage to continue so, for if he tried to be too affectionate to any of my Circassians, I would bowstring him without a moment's hesitation. I am sorry Joe Redding got no further than New York. Give my regards to Sir Michael de Young, Sir Henry Heyman, Sir William H. Barnes, and any other knights and noblemen you may remember. Tell the Bohemian boys that those stories about my people slaughtering those vile Armenians are all a flam. By the way, Hall is studying the Koran diligently. Drop a hint to Doc Stebbins that I'd like to have him and Rabbi Voorsanger over here for an hour—I wouldn't do nothing to them! oh no. They'd make a hole in the Bosphorus in short order, you hear me! Allah, Bish Mallah.

ABDUL HAMID.

This remarkable document Sir Northrope will have framed, and it will be placed among the archives of the Bohemian Club.

A cloud, no bigger than a mau's hand, has grown up within the portals of the big house on California street, where Pacific Coast art has her permanent residence. The sculptors, who sculpt in clay, are at daggers drawn with the painters. The Michael Angeloes in embryo declare that they do not want to be confined to the basement, but long for the sun and air of the upper apartments. The painters and the Directors protest that they will not endure the trail of mud the sculptors leave behind them on the stairways, and that they must sculpt in the basement, or not at all. Again, some of the conservative Directors believe that there is not the necessary discipline among the classes. Pupils should be taught to understand that they are not admitted to the society of the antiques to cut up and while away the hours in monkey shines. With those grievances lifting their heads like thistles in a fertile field, there is little doubt but there will be a thorough scouring out in the Art Association pretty shortly, and a new and more exacting regime established.

Joe King, the Supervisor, to Parson Bovard says:
 "Ye shepherds seem unconscious of the errors of your ways;
 "Ye rail at social gatherings, and horribly perplex
 "Young men and modest maidens with cautions about sex,
 "Yet all this time the newspapers are filled with shocking cases,
 "Where parsons make the sisters good by kisses and embraces;
 "Before ye preach that dance and call are dangerous to souls,
 "And apt to furnish fancy roasts for Satan's sulphurous coals,
 "With morality's big bosom sweep out the muddy church,
 "And see your own white robe is clean, ere others you besmirch."
 In this sound piece of counsel to resolutions wed,
 It looks if Mr. King had hit the nail square on the head.

There was an amusing episode in one of the Market street cafés the other night—quite a prominent one, too. Two peripatetic colored gentlemen—"black as the ace of spades"—with banjo and guitar, wandered into the establishment, and asked if they might play a "chew'n" "jes" for a glass of dat yar beer." The good-natured German proprietor was so much amused that he gave his consent, whereupon the pair sat down and played: "Do you love me, Liza Jane?" in seventeen different discords.

Just then Ashton Stevens, the well-known musical composer, happened along with a friend—on their way home. "Stop," said Mr. Stevens; "we'll have some fun."

Entering the place, they instructed the proprietor to send over two schooners to the "coons." Result—great joy—and a banjo string snapped in the middle of "Buffalo Gals Come Out To-night," which stopped the show.

"Here's a string," said Stevens, who is never unprovided. So drawing out his little pocket case, he proceeded to restring the old dorky's battered instrument.

Then, with his inimitable art, he played "Swanee River" for them.

They were wild with ecstasy and delight. So was the big crowd of visitors at the place. Mr. Stevens continued on for twenty minutes, till the audience was getting embarrassingly large. Then he calmly arose, and took up a collection in the banjo for the "two coons." It amounted to $4.50.

They haven't been seen since.

The Clerk of the Weather, who dwells in the sky,
 Of late has found pastime amusing,
 In making the weather clerk on earth a guy,
 And all his predictions confusing;
 Until weary at last, he called out from his throne:
 "Say, Hammon, I'll give you a pouring,
 "I've had lots of fun, now I'll let you alone,"
 So Hammon's flags once more are soaring.

The members of the Bohemian Club held their quarterly meeting on Tuesday, and elected a nominating committee to make up the regular ticket for the next election in April. Mr. Horace Platt has no aspirations for a third term, and therefore, will not figure in the fight. Mr. Vanderlyn Stow and Dr. George Chismore are the two most prominent candidates before the club for the Presidency. Dr. Chismore is one of the most popular men in the club, and has found time from the demands of his profession to cultivate the Muses to a considerable extent. He writes good verse, and is so modest withal, that it is only upon special occasions he flings the saddle over Pegasus, and rides that noble steed bravely for the edification of Bohemia.

Saturday night last the contest of the Union League Club terminated in favor of Colonel George Stone for the Presidency. There were a number of candidates, but this gentleman's popularity, both in business and army circles, won the day. Colonel Stone has been a resident of California since 1868, and is a native of New York State. As a boy just out of school he enlisted in the Union army at the first call for troops in 1861, and served in the Third, Fourteenth, and Eighteenth New York cavalry regiments, successively. His gallantry on the field won him quick promotion, and he was in active service for five years. At various times he served under Generals Canby, Banks, Hurlbut, and Merritt. In 1866 he was mustered out of the army with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. Although strongly recommended by officers high in rank for a transfer to the regular army, he decided not to make the application, and having an excellent training as a civil and topographical engineer, he accepted the position of engineer in the construction department of the Union Pacific Railway. When the road was completed, in 1868, Colonel Stone came to California, and was a contractor for some five years for the Southern Pacific Railway. He is now engaged in the construction of the San Luis Obispo and Santa Barbara Railway. His mining interests in Nevada County and in Yuba are extremely extensive, involving huge interests in the May, Shamrock, Merrimac, Kentuck, Norambagua, besides others. As a public man, Colonel Stone is a staunch Republican, and has worked hard for his party. A member of the Union League Club since the first year of its re-organization, he has spared no effort in effecting its prosperity. It may be also of interest to know that he is Treasurer of the People's Home Savings Bank, now in liquidation. He was chosen to represent the bank by the stockholders.

The expected arrival of Duke Degli Abruzzi, the King of Italy's first cousin, next week will be a sort of event in bicycle circles. He is an enthusiastic bicyclist, and carries his wheel with him on his tour around the world. It was his stepmother, Princess Letitia, who was sent by King Humbert to close confinement for riding through the principal streets in Florence clad in rather tight bloomers. He visits San Francisco on the big Italian cruiser, Christoforo Colombo. Query—Is he after one of our wealthy native daughters? He is very rich himself, however, so far as Italian fortunes are concerned, that he will have to come high.

A lot was sold on Mission street the other day, which was a part of the estate of Paddy Burns, a wealthy blacksmith, whose name has now become a portion of ancient history. Paddy's luck was of the most novel kind. He was working in his forge one evening, when a couple of young men dashed furiously in. One flung a sack in a coal heap, and the other plunged a similar package in a barrel of water. Both then fled through the rear entrance, and immediately four policemen, all breathless and revolvers in hand, entered.

"We are after a couple of fellows that have just robbed Sather & Co.'s bank," shouted an officer. "Did they come in here?"

"That they did," replied Paddy promptly, "and then went out that way," pointing in a direction opposite to that taken by the robbers. The police flashed after them, and the sagacious blacksmith picked up the sacks, which held some twenty thousand dollars. He never heard of the thieves again, kept his own counsel, and judiciously invested this strangely acquired capital. And Paddy Burns' luck became a byword in after days, when the rich old blacksmith got into the habit of relating the incident with unctious.

"Billy," said Victoria, taking off her slipper,
"Come and lie across my knee" (Vic is quite a whipper);
"Grandma," cried that naughty boy, "I'm a Hohenzollern, You'd not see a swell like me snivelling and hollering!"
But Her Majesty, despite cousins, nieces, aunties,
Has made up her mind to spank Billy's little panties.

Harry Gillig and Frank Unger are again on the Pacific Coast, and will pass a few of the winter months in this frostless clime. Their arrival here will be the cause of much rejoicing in Bohemia.

Once Julius Haste desired to taste
The sweets of office without measure.
Then Deacon squealed, his fate was sealed,
And Haste may now repent at leisure.

OUR society is probably not aware of how severely it has suffered by the recent Brown scandal, but one of the most interesting entertainments ever offered for its delectation has been nipped in the bud, so to speak, by the killing frost of fear. It is said a well-known old bachelor of our most conservative circles was to have given a baby show at his esthetic home for the benefit of a fashionable church choir, and everything was progressing most favorably towards a successful issue when the notoriety of the aforesaid suit created a panic in the old beau's mind. Visions of babies being literally as well as figuratively "left at his door," claims of ownership, etc., being involved, all loomed before him to such an alarming extent the result has been the abandonment of the unique baby show, and society must fain be content with the more prosaic and commonplace concert at a public hall instead.

Although anxious parents of a worldly turn of mind may not altogether like their girls' admiration for wearers of bright buttons, yet it has its palliation in the fact that the officers have driven the Brownies to the wall. These youngsters, who in the earlier part of the season swarmed around tea tables and suffered the petting of the women, now find themselves relegated to amuse the very young girls who are in the budding stage. This is eminently as it should be. The sight of a veteran belle of many seasons and a smooth-faced boy in a flirtation game engaged being a nauseous one to most people.

Our young men have a cause of complaint against Frank Newlands, in that he has chosen Washington City as the locale for the debut of his daughters, the co-heiresses of their grandfather Sharon's estate. But evidently the astute champion of silver is aware of the lack of "distinction" to be had in exchange for wealth in the city of their birth, and that factor in the world's esteem holds high place with the Congressman from Nevada.

It is a noteworthy fact that the entire group of lovely buds of the season are unanimous in expressions of delight over the possible union of a wealthy young man and a beautiful young girl—noteworthy in that not a lisp of malice has been uttered, not a whisper of envy or jealousy been heard. Surely the young couple must be more than ordinarily popular to provoke so amiable a condition of things.

Of all the untiring members of our society none can surpass Mrs. Henry Scott, who seems ever on the alert to provide pleasure for her friends as well as for herself. Not only does she gather them around her hospitable board in town, but the spacious B'lingham cottage has become renowned for its large and jolly "house parties" weekly given by this popular matron.

There has been much pouting among the buds that the Philadelphia should have been ordered away, and so soon before their Leap Year cotillion, too, the presence of the navy chaps at the Presidio hop last week proving such a delightful addition to the button beaux of the Post. But no words can express the gratification of the wearers of black coats thereof.

The pupils in the rival fashionable schools in our midst are much excited over a football contest which is to take place between the teams of the Lake and West Seminaries. Even the holidays have not abated the furore of daily practice, say the girls, each side being confident of victory.

The trainante tones of voice and velvety glances of Miss Elma Graves seem to be doing a fair amount of execution among the male portion of the recently organized "riding class."

The girls say Phil Tompkins is pressing Ad. Mizner hard in daring speech and action, calling him "a regular case." His brother Min has more of the milk of human kindness, they declare; but that is not astonishing, they add, when one remembers his occupation.

"Who would have dreamed that Jennie would marry a Shoemaker!" was heard at a bud dinner last week.

THE WOMAN IN BUSINESS

A LOT of people were present at an auction sale of Japanese goods recently.

"How much am I bid for this exquisite vase?" asked the auctioneer, holding it above his head.

"Five dollars," responded an elderly lady, sitting in one of the front seats.

"That's a shame," cried the man with the hammer. "This vase, as a work of art, is worth four times that sum. Why, look at it. Will an intelligent audience allow such a sacrifice?"

"Six dollars," came in the same woman's voice.

Well, well, well! Can't you see that this is a treasure, and you stand here and allow it to be given away for such a paltry sum?"

"Eight dollars," Again it was the same bidder speaking.

"Eight dollars! The very idea!" ejaculated the auctioneer. "I never saw the like. Come, what is the meaning of this? One of the Mikado's especial designs slighted in such a manner! It is a reflection on our taste."

"Nine dollars," said the solitary bidder.

"It is too costly, too precious, and too rare in pattern. Wake up, or I'll put it back in the box."

"Ten dollars," the woman said.

"Well, it doesn't seem as if I can get any more, so here it goes. Ten dollars—once, twice, three times! Sold to the lady there at that shameful figure."

The lady stepped up, paid for and received her parcel, and departed, apparently without noticing the smiles of the audience.—Ohio State Journal.

—The employment of kerosene oil as a local application to wounds and ulcers is reported by the New York Medical Journal. "Ulcers, especially indolent and atonic ulcers, were smeared with commercial kerosene, either pure or diluted (from 35 to 50 per cent.) with alcohol, by means of a small camel's hair brush or with a piece of gauze soaked in the solution. The appearance and character of the ulcers soon changed for the better, the discharge gradually diminished, and in from two to four weeks the rapidly granulating surface formed a scar without any contraction in the surrounding parts." The advantage claimed for kerosene are rapidity of action, economy, and freedom from poisonous effects.

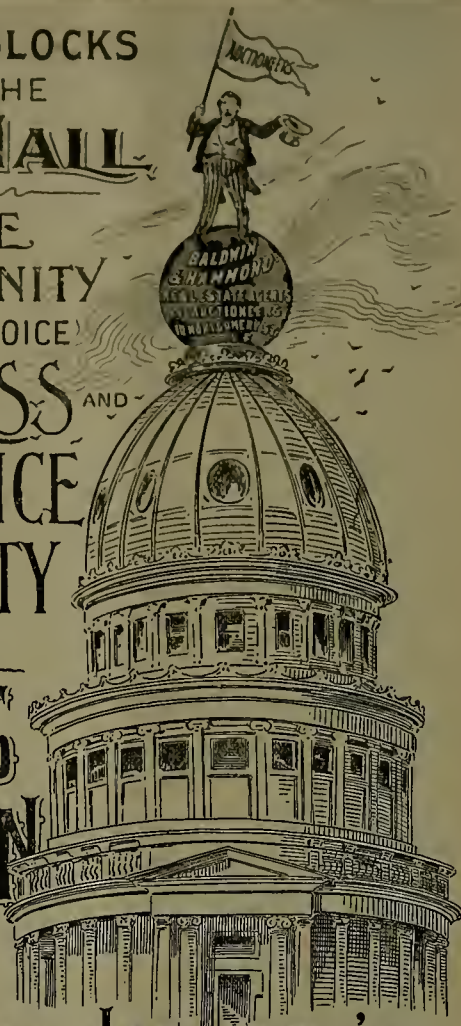

—An English detective went down to Aldershot to search the ranks of a militia regiment for a criminal who was "wanted." Up and down went the investigator, till at length he stopped opposite the left-hand man of the rear rank, and looked hard at him.

"Come," said the colonel, his dignity and esprit de corps not a little offended, "this can't be the man you want surely. He's the best man I've got in the regiment. You don't mean to say you know him?"

"No," replied the detective, after a pause, "I don't—he's the only man in your regiment I don't know, and I was wondering where he came from."—Ex.

Comstock Mining Shares. Business was very dull on Pine street during the week just past, and prices have gradually been seeking a lower level. It is just a continued case of dry rot and a lack of the men financially able to carry out a programme once it has been outlined. The mines are in excellent condition for an operation, but they might as well be in Jamaica for all the influence they can exert in making a market, unless there is some one behind the game able to pull the wires intelligently without getting tangled up in them himself. There has been lots of talk for months past about the "magnets" not being ready, and all that, but it should be a good "ready" when it comes along. The whole fact of the matter is that something will have to be done by somebody to resurrect matters, and somebody means in reality nobody. The brokers are individually helpless to work out the salvation of all, and individually they are anything but a unit, a condition of affairs which the last election has not served to ameliorate or improve. Had Marks been elected matters would have looked much brighter than they do just now. Affairs are nearing a crisis in the Pine street institutions, and a man of his strong calibre would have done much to have turned the tide to victory. But it is no use talking about it now. The coming year will tell, after the battle with rival concerns has been waged to an issue, amid internal strife and jealousies. The Occidental mine is said to be looking well in an upraise above the 650-level, although the stock has not shown it at all times. Justice and Alta were assessed 10 cents during the week, and Union Con. 20 cents.

The Local Financial Outlook. Brokers in local stocks and bonds report a very fair demand for dividend paying securities of unquestioned merit. Although money is plentiful, there is little dabbling in outside enterprises. Nevertheless the majority of people manage somehow to keep posted upon what is going on in the speculative markets, ready for a plunge should any of their neighbors take the initiative with any degree of success. The facts about the Bouru clean-up having leaked out, it has once more become apparent that all the vitality has not yet been sapped out of the community, and that some of the old spirit and vim is still in existence—only latent. It is safe to make the prediction that some day not very far distant, speculation will again be rife in this city, with innumerable opportunities for money making. On Wednesday last the following dividends were payable: Bank of California, \$3 for the quarter; Pacific Surety Company, 2 per cent. for the quarter; California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, \$1.50 for the quarter; Nevada Bank, \$1.50 for the half-year; Wells, Fargo & Co., \$3 for the half-year. Also, the following monthly dividends: Edison Light and Power, 66 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; Oakland Gas, 25 c.; San Francisco Gas, 35 c.; Pacific Telephone, 30 c.; Sunset Telephone, 20 c. The California Lumber Company has levied an assessment of \$10 per share.

The Western Output of Precious Metals John J. Valentine, President of Wells, Fargo & Co., has issued his customary annual statement of the bullion product of the Coast for 1895, as follows: California, $14,447,912; Nevada, $2,581,913; Oregon, $1,852,430; Washington, $552,467; Alaska, $1,469,420; Idaho, $7,426,898; Montana, $37,832,500; Utah, $9,222,052; Colorado, $28,545,659; New Mexico, $2,499,586; Arizona, $7,352,776; Dakota, $3,688,785; Texas, 387,340; Wyoming, $37,250; British Columbia, $267,654. Total, $118,164,642. The amount is made up as follows: Gold, 41.19 per cent., $48,667,383; silver, 29.85, $35,274,777; copper, 22.89, $27,052,115; lead, 6.7, $7,170,367. Silver is valued in the statement at 65 cents, copper 11 cents, and lead 3.23 cents. The production is the largest since 1891. The gold output for California was $10,940,491, in dust and bullion by express, and $3,063,617 in bullion and dust by other conveyances, making in all $14,004,105. The total product for 1894, according to same authority; was $105,113,489.

A New Richmond In The Field Charles McDermott, whose name and reputation is not altogether unfamiliar to old-time mining men in California, is about to descend on London with the old Taylor mine or the Idlewild. He got the Marble Heart on the same proposition a few weeks ago in Chicago, and this is the reason that London has been selected as a dumping ground. It is said that for many years expatriated McDermott has the audacity to ask $650,000 for these mines, which would be a dear bargain at a tenth of the amount, but modesty is not one of the gentleman's failings. The enterprise is one which should be left severely alone, if for no other reason than the fact that McDermott is the promoter. He has been in the business before, much to the sorrow of many people of standing in this city, but not in any case did he get off with the plunder scot free. English investors had better go slow in dealing with this scheme, and avoid it entirely if they wish to be safe.

American Mines for American Owners. The New York Financial News says of our domestic gold mines: "First class gold mines need not go begging in any part of the world. Americans as yet do not seem to be up to the high prices asked by English promoters, consequently but few of our best are offered here, finding a ready market and being gradually absorbed by foreign capital, which is ever on the alert in California, Colorado, and all of our Western mining States. The live Yankee, however, is rapidly preparing to work and keep his gold mines, having found out that this is the 'gold era,' and that no other business pays so well when properly carried on. We have a dozen South Africas, and can afford to keep them." And the biggest South Africa of the lot is right at home here in California, and within the boundaries of her neighbors on the south and east. We want the Monroe Doctrine applied in the case of our mines as much as anything else.

Hammond's Latest Experience. The arrest of Mr. John Hays Hammond, the distinguished California engineer, by the Boers, among whom he has the misfortune to sojourn at present, gave rise to much anxiety among his relatives and friends in this city at first, until the full particulars came to hand by cable. It was thought at first that matters were much more serious, judging from the exaggerated stories which have crept out of the Rand into the outer world. The safety of Mr. Hammond from aught save a temporary annoyance is now fully assured, which is a subject for general congratulation. The other gentlemen from California who have likewise suffered for the same cause, will meet with the heartiest sympathy in their trouble.

New York Stock Market. The market during the week has shown little improvement. Prices, however, have been well maintained, and holders seem less disposed to part with their stocks. Prices in comparison with one week ago show only slight changes. The Grangers are from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. higher. L. & N., Lake Shore, D. & R. G. have all advanced $\frac{3}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Mauihatten lost 2 per cent. The reorganization plan has been accepted on Reading, and the first assessment of \$5 per share is now due. Western Union is still selling below 85 on fears of the B. & O. stock coming out at any time. Industrials have improved. Sugar has advanced 4 per cent. The destruction of plantations in Cuba has strengthened the market. Leather is also stronger.

The Rawhide Electric Plant. Captain W. A. Nevills, who has been confined to his room at the Palace with illness for some days past, has been able to leave for his home at Sonora. The new electric plant at the Rawhide Mine will be all ready to start up by March 1st, which will make the company independent of water supply for the future. The mine is opening up better than ever, and an immense amount of ore is now exposed, ready for extraction when the reduction plant is ready.

From Arizona to West Australia. The Harquahala Gold Mining Company has had such success with their purchase in Arizona that they are now working might and main to even up on a property which has recently been purchased at Kalgoorlie in Western Australia. Mr. R. M. Raymond is just about arriving at Kalgoorlie, having been sent for in Arizona last month.

WE take a great deal of pleasure in making a permanent record of the little amenities which adorn the social life of this our Queen City of the Pacific Slope. Mrs. Carrie Duncan, whose name until recently has probably never ornamented the scrolls of scandal or of fame, has leapt into celebrity at a single bound. This is the way it happened, and it was quite unexpected, too. As with all the ladies of our Four Hundred, who like to do this sort of thing, the hour for administering to the appetite that reminds us of the dinner bell had arrived, and the appetite with it, but her lord—he came not. No well regulated lady of our City of the Golden Gate is going without her dinner because her lord lingers. She thereupon glided to our local Delmonico's, and began to save herself from starvation. Good digestion waited on her appetite, and she was rather enjoying the luxuries of Messrs. Gutzeit & Mal-fanti's cuisine, when the door opened and there entered her inconstant husband with one of her sex to her unknown. The newly-arrived couple seated themselves at another and not distant table. Their dinner began and progressed. Wife and husband saw each other; they glanced, then glared. He forgot the demeanor which would have been most becoming, and smirked, winked, and made contortions to his wife. Female loveliness is at times very lovely, but there is a limit to female patience. Madame Duncan, provoked to wrath, gave that single bound just alluded to, picked up a half-filled bottle of claret and smashed it over the head of her erring lord, with remarks that enquired of his daring to comport himself thus and so. This little inadvertent movement of the lady made a great deal of trouble, for it resulted in breaking up the interesting tête-à-tête of her husband and his second-best girl, and induced a baptism of ruby over her husband's face that was not all wine. Then, dreaming of criminal charges, of murder, and of sudden death, she ran to give herself up to the police, who would not receive her approaches. Mr. Duncan made no charge, but saved his ammunition for the divorce court. It does seem as though the rights of married people had got to be more clearly defined, so that such disagreeable infelicities may not happen to disturb the peaceful current of the stream of matrimony. In the millenium, which we hope will hurry along and not keep us waiting, we are sure that people may be happy, even though married, and the only improvement we really expect is that people will find they can be so happy, even though unmarried, that nothing can tempt them to seek a greater felicity.

WHAT'S the matter with the new Valley road, that was going to be built like lightning for the good of the people and the especial glory of Mr. Demosthenes Preston, its sagacious attorney? Merely this and nothing more: The people of Fresno happened not to be so everlastingly stuck after the new road, as everybody here was made to believe everybody was, and so refused to act upon the application of the railroad company for permission to construct the road across the town. Then Attorney Preston thought he would teach them a little law. The company applied at once to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandate compelling the trustees of the town to act, and waited to get the writ and swoop down on Fresno, and get the permission and build the road right away. Then the Supreme Court gave a little chirp, and the great Preston and all the little legal assistants found that the chirp meant that the writ was denied. That was all there was of it. But it was enough. It wasn't as deep as a well, nor as wide as a barn door, but 'twas enough, and the learned attorney had learned that he couldn't boss an executive and legislative body that has a discretion to exercise—and went home. It will probably never be said that much learning hath made lawyer Preston mad, though his lack of it may make some of his clients so. And now the new railroad company will have to follow the directions of the statute, which it would better have done before, and then, mayhap, may in time build its road through the town of Fresno.

OAKLAND is not going to permit San Francisco to surpass it in attractions for strangers. Its only Populist journal may die, but the editors of the other papers will not go to sleep if they keep a true record of all the foolish and criminal things that happen there. We do considerable murdering on this side of the bay, but their magistrates are not less busy. Mr. Hill asked his wife out for a walk over there a few days ago, and, finding there was a difference of opinion existing between them on certain domestic matters, he drew his little gun, and wilfully, maliciously, and feloniously, then and there buried several bullets in and about her head, neck and body. Then he followed the advice he had doubtless given himself some time beforehand, and, after giving himself up, as there wasn't any particular way of escape, he declined to be interviewed. Fortunately he was able to obtain the services of a lawyer, who was not just at that time engaged in anything more criminal himself, and in time appeared in court, and in answer to the charge of murder, said he was not guilty. His astute lawyer has fallen in with his own theory of the case, and gives out that just the moment before he began shooting his wife, he became insane, mad as a March hare. If that was so, of course he was not guilty of murder, and, though the sound of the shooting awoke him to the complete recovery of his senses, yet no properly endowed jury will think of convicting him. Since his lucky plea of insanity came to the great minds of himself and his lawyer, he has begun to show unmistakable signs of mania. He is melancholy, silent, forgetful of the past, and will soon, or all symptoms are valueless, begin frothing at the mouth. This, at intervals, will occur until his acquittal. We shall now wait patiently to see how long it will take common sense to ride supreme in the Oakland courts, and declare the sanity of the jury by a verdict which shall hang Mr. Hill as high as Haman.

THE people of this city have been regaled with a precious lot of scandalous entertainment within the past month. If wickedness, and scandal, its dearest parasite, are the offspring of the Devil, one may curiously ask if any other can tell of what gender the Devil really is. Is the Devil only the father of lies, or is she the mother of envy, backbiting, deceit, adulteries, fornications, thievery, blackmail, and every other kind of wickedness? We incline to the opinion, from our experience and the knowledge widespread by means of that agent of the Devil, the daily press, that the Devil does exist; that said person is neither male alone, nor female alone, nor bi-sexual. We think it is multitudinous, and ubiquitous, and omnipresent, and spiritually exists not at any particular place, nor in, nor with any particular person, but becometh a part, and a large part, of every individual who loves evil and eschews decency. These wise reflections come to us voluntarily as we involuntarily turn our thoughts to the saintly, gray-haired lady who is now living without charge at the public institution on Broadway, known as the jail. As the Devil is sometimes called a gentleman, so we shall be justified in saying that, in this case at least, the Devil is very much of a lady. Doth she not quote scripture for her purpose? Doth she not wear the white robes of purity without, and is she not within, as are all hypocrites—a whited sepulchre, full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. Her name has been made so infamously well-known of late that only the blind, who read not the dailies, do not know it. An allusion is as good as a naming, as a wink to a blind horse is as good as a nod.

THE so-called gentleman, who still lingers with us under the title of a lord, by a faculty with which he is over liberally endowed, manages to do something so superlatively stupid at least once in seven days, that he keeps his dullness everlastingly in remembrance. He has been to Stockton and returned by steamer, and displays an unusually swelled head. He explains that it came from the berth, in which he lay, meeting his skull, through an inadvertence of his own in attempting to discover why he was rudely shocked by the boat's meeting an impediment which failed to give way. There is no doubt a way to explain the fact that one has a swelled head. It comes in various ways. Sometimes it comes by accident, sometimes by birth. In the case of this ignoble lord there is no doubt he has come by it naturally, and that it has been his from his birth.

A Book
of the Week.*

The literary merits or demerits of George Meredith have, for many years, been an open question. Some critics have contended that he is one of the greatest of English novelists, while others have pronounced him the poorest, and the public has labeled him as the hardest to understand. That he can be powerful and passionate we know, but that he can be obscure and artificial we know also. His verbiage may be, apparently, senseless, but if one has patience, and a good deal of it, this apparently senseless verbiage may be read with profit. His books are often full of original investigations of the human character, but one requires the patience of Job to find them out. His most artistic story is, we believe, "Diana of the Crossways," and his "Tale of Chloe," and other short stories, are good because their brevity serves as a restraint upon his style. But whatever doubt may have, heretofore, existed about his place in English letters, he has, we believe, dispelled it by his last book, just published in New York, and called "The Amazing Marriage." In plain words, then, this book convinces us that George Meredith cannot write good common sense English at all. He may be imaginative and his characters may possess firmness and solidity, while we may wonder at the sparkle of his aphorisms and the dazzling profusion of his tropes, yet his English is faulty and his imagination too redundant and unrestrained. He will not be clear, and, while we do not object to a little obscurity, and rather enjoy the necessity of finding out what the author is after, yet George Meredith twists and turns, and doubles into a score of metaphysical relations which are, too often, inconsistent or forced. And yet, if we take away all this redundancy of figurative imagery we lose the rich poetic flavor which permeates his books, and it is in this fact that the peculiarity of his writings lie. Now can any of our readers tell us what on earth the author is driving at when, in one sentence in "The Amazing Marriage," he says:

"A notation of the eries in air at a time of surgent public excitement, can hardly yield us music; and the wording of them, by aid of compounds and transplants, metaphors and similes, only just within the range of the arrows of Phœbus's bow (that is, the furthest flight known) would, while it might intimate the latest poetry, expose venture-some writers to the wrath of a people commendably believing their language a perfected instrument, when they prefer the request for a plateful, and commissioning their literary polico to brain audacious experimenters who enlarge or wing it beyond the downright aim of the mark."

Now we again ask: What in the name of common sense English does the man mean? We have read this sentence over and over again, and although we are bold enough to say that we have some knowledge of our language, yet we confess on our knees, and with forehead to the pavement, that we are so profoundly unlighted that we do not understand the exact meaning of the sentence we have quoted. To us it is a bewildering concatenation. We are aware that some well-known critics think language of this kind should not be objected to because it is obscure, but, according to our humble judgment, this is too much of a good thing, and we deny that it is English at all. The admirers of George Meredith may tell us that this "obscurity" is one of his chief charms, if they will, but we would rather have some of the plain English we are accustomed to in Addison, Dickens, Thackeray, Scott, Kipling, or the thousand and one inferior authors who are never even named as among the first great novelists of the day. The language we have quoted is careless, unritical, and incongruous. Or what sort of conception is one to get from a combination of metaphors such as this:

"As a consequence, the truisms flooded him, and he lost his guard against our native prosiness. Must we be prosy, if we are profound, unequivocally sincere? Do but listen to the stuff we are mauling! Spouting extracts from poetry, if we could but hit upon the right, would serve for a relief and a lift when we are in this ditch of the serious vein. Gower Wordseer would have any number handy to spout."

Is this English? Is it common sense? Is it worthy of a man who is, according to some people, "the greatest of English novelists"? What critic or reader who values his reputation for knowing "B from a bull's foot," will tell us that George Meredith, in the sentences we have quoted, has not sacrificed sense for vain conceit; and this fact stares us in the face here and there, from the commencement to the close of "The Amazing Marriage." They stamp the book with a fatal blemish. Tell us of his wealth of description in the book, and we will say: yes, we admit it; point out the strong passages and striking episodes and we will applaud; remind us of the flesh and blood men and women he places before us so that we fancy we know them, and we will tell you that we admit it all, but in face of all this we can say that no adequate motive directs the conduct of the principal characters, and that the book crumbles to pieces when it is examined in detail. The association of ideas are wholly fortuitous and external, and when, for instance, he says:

"She ceases. According to the terms of the treaty the venerable lady's time has expired. An extinguisher descends on her, giving her the likeness of one under condemnation of the Most Holy Inquisition, in the ranks of an auto da fe; and singularly resembling that victim at the first sharp bite of the flames she will be when she hears the version of her story."

Are not the similes here too far fetched, and do not their meaning become so obscure that they are lost in mist, leaving the reader still wondering what on earth the author means? That Mr. Meredith is felicitous now and again, we do not deny. He does not indeed give us that wealth of epigram which made "The Egotist" so popular, but yet we find many brilliant things in "The Amazing Marriage." But the wonder is that with all his brilliancy such a great writer, and in spite of all his faults he is a great writer, should give us a conceit of style such as this:

"There was Madge and the donkey basket-trap ahead on the road to the house, bearing proof of the veiled had been; signification of a might-have-been. Why not a possible might-be? Still the might-be, the might-be."

And so it goes on, so it begins, and so it ends, brilliant in part, but, on the whole, disappointing, and all because George Meredith insists in writing so that we must read him through a fog. To this, we object because we want our books written in plain English, and this is something George Meredith does not give us.

* "An Amazing Marriage," by George Meredith.

It has often been said that Bacon was a son of Queen Elizabeth by the Earl of Essex. Mr. Lawrence Hutton has revived this story, and he gives a general review of the many similar rumors that were at one time afloat about the "Virgin Queen." In Ireland, we know, it is said to this day that the family of Mapother, in the county of Roscommon, is descended from Queen Elizabeth, and other stories are to the effect that the Earl of Ormond and the Earl of Leicester knew more about Elizabeth's love affairs than ordinary men should. But, on the other hand, Lingard discredits all those rumors, and Mr. Hutton uses them, we see, to throw ridicule on the pretense that Bacon was the Queen's son or that he wrote Shakespeare.

It is a pleasure to see the rising tide of Scott's popularity, and the reprinting of Miss Austin and Maria Edgeworth works. Let us hope that this renewed activity in sound literature will push the guinea dreadfuls of the Caines, Allens, and Hardys out of the field. The books published by those morbid and meretricious writers are no more to be compared with this revival of classic works than "green goods" are to be compared with sound money.

Scribners have published so many thrashy books lately among some good ones that we welcome Professor Nathaniel Thaler, of Harvard, on "Domesticated Animals, Their Relation to Man, and to his Advancement in Civilization." But the author might have saved us that very old quotation, "The mule has no pride of ancestry and no hope of posterity."

THE JOURNEY.—BESSIE CHANDLER.

It is many a year since in sunny weather
We started, nor cared if the way were long;
There were Youth, Health, Love, and myself; together
We sang, and our voices were clear and strong.

What joy we had in the beautiful weather!
How flowery the way that our path lay through!
How we laughed in the gladness we shared together!
How green were the fields, and the sky how blue!

If the sky grew gray, in the rainy weather,
Why, a dull gray sky could do us no harm;
Or if chill winds blew, we were still together,
Close, close together, and so kept warm.

But, alas, one day (it was autumn weather)
Yonth stopped, and his face was wan and white.
"We can journey no more," he cried, "together;"
But he smiled and waved till we past from sight.

Health faltered next (ah, bad was the weather!)
"I will join you," he said, "in a little while;"
So Love and I walked onward together,
With backward glances for many a mile.

We have gone on since in all kinds of weather,
We have waited for Health at each stopping-place,
And we sought in vain, though we sought together,
For Youth, who left us with wan white face.

But I have not missed them, nor minded the weather,
Nor cared if I failed in every quest,
For Love and I made the journey together;
Love never left me; what mattered the rest?

LIFE'S CONTRASTS.—TEMPLE BAR.

Perfume of roses and warbling of birds,
Sweetest of sweet June days,
Kindliest glances and tenderest words,
Sbadiest woodland ways;
Murmuring brooklets and whispering trees,
Drowsiest song of the soft humming bees;
Hope, love, trust, peace.

And besides—
I and he, he and I.

Wintry winds rustling the fallen, dead leaves,
Sullen and lowering the sky.
Creeping mists hiding sad earth as she grieves,
Mourning for days gone by;
Cataracts foaming 'neath bare, leafless trees,
Chilly blasts sweeping o'er lone, barren leas;
Heartache, doubts, tears,
And besides—
I alone, only I.

LOVE'S WISDOM.—ALFRED AUSTIN.

Now on the summit of Love's topmost peak
Kiss we and part; no further can we go:
And better death than we from high to low
Should dwindle or decline from strong to weak.
We have found all, there is no more to seek;
All have we proved, no more is there to know;
And time could only tutor us to eke
Out rapture's warmth with custom's afterglow.
We cannot keep at such a height as this
For even straining souls like ours inhale
But once in life so rarefied a bliss,
What if we lingered till love's breath should fail!
Heaven of my earth! one more celestial kiss,
Then down by separate pathways to the vale.

FOR HESPER JOYCE LE GALLIENNE.—JOHN DAVIDSON.

What boat is this comes o'er the sea
From islands of Eternity?
A little boat, a cradle boat,
The signals of the mast denote;
And in the boat, a little life:
Happy husband, happy wife!

San Francisco, December 31, 1895.

DEAR SIR: The following is our Annual Report of Precious Metals produced in the States and Territories west of the Missouri River (including British Columbia) during 1895, which shows in the aggregate: Gold, $48,667,383; Silver, $35,274,777; Copper, $27,052,115; Lead, $7,170,367. Total gross result, $118,164,642. The "commercial" value at which the several metals named herein have been estimated, is: Silver, 65 cts. per oz.; Copper, 11 cts. per lb.; and lead, $3.23 per cwt.

Allowance must always be made for probable variations from reported figures, by reason of constantly increasing facilities for transporting bullion, ores and base metals from the mines outside of the express and the difficulty of getting entirely reliable data from private sources. Estimates obtained in this way are liable to be exaggerated and are, to a considerable degree, guess work; but with some modifications on this account, made herein, the general results reached, while only approximately correct, may be accepted as the closest approximation possible under the circumstances.

It will be observed that in Current Product—both Gold and Silver—Mexico shows a continued increase.

J. M. Valentine
President.

DEAR EDITH:—The prophetic words of Sarah Bernhardt in New York—when she came back on her very last farewell, and for the "veriest last time!"—concerning the coming fashions after Lent must have awakened a certain heart-ache in the bosoms of many families.

Last Sunday, I believe it was, that she landed in Gotham, but at once she proceeded to cast consternation into the hearts of some thirty million—or, say forty—American women, with the statement that there is about to be a revolution in gowns—and that, right away!

In her naïve fashion the great actress declares that no more will the Marie Antoinette fashions prevail, but that the Empire and Josephine its Imperial Queen would set the style—just as if she were living now.

There is a lovely vision of Marie Antoinette in the famous painting by Delacroix when she descended the stern, cruel steps of the Conciergerie. This, with its fantastic, diaphanous, filmy lace fissure—whether one calls it a Berthe—or anything else—has won the world.

Once upon a time Sarah Bernhardt said she could start the fashions for the world. Probably she does. But, dear me! how she hates the wide bell-shaped skirt and the "fluffy" sleeve! She pronounces its era past.

Already I hear from our Parisian friends signals of the coming "Disturbance," Madame Bernhardt, who with Rejane and others—say Yvette Guilbert among them—have managed the fashions, styles, in hats, bonnets and clothes and foot-gear for some time,—will endeavor to induce a Napoleonic Era. It seems that even now the reign of white gowns which was the very insistence of the last fin de siècle is being restored in Europe.

As a sign, the introduction of the dainty old-fashioned "pattens"—or dainty slippers, with cross straps for the ball-room,—certainly marks an inclination to advance toward the era of the Empire.

But Madame Bernhardt declares that women have no originality about dress nowadays, and she thinks men have exaggerated themselves into a perfect stupidity of Puritanism. Perhaps the lady would like to watch President Cleveland walk down Massachusetts avenue arrayed in silk and scarlet, with a swaggering sword at his side!—as in old times.

Nevertheless the fashions of the day hardly apply to California. There is too much fur "flying." We have not as bad a climate as we think—and it is not half as bad as things they whisper about New York.

But, yet, we will wear furs, and when we can't have Russian sable—which costs about a hundred dollars an inch, we wear "genteel" substitutes,—how we hate that word "genteel!"

The Chiuchilla fur has suddenly become the style after the sable, and it's much cheaper in this country than it is in Paris, by the way. It is used very effectively on cloth and woolen gowns, and one of the prettiest costumes of recent date that I have seen is of green cloth, with two skirts—the upper one cut into points about the bottom, which are edged by the fur. The bodice has a surplice front and is trimmed by a band of Oriental embroidery—a dream in green and gold. The band edges the surplice front, crossing over the bust to the left side. From thence it encircles the waist, forming the belt.

By the way, you must carry a rabbit's foot in polite society, just now. Mrs. Cleveaud does, and so do most of the Senator's wives—just for pure good luck—or "Glück," as the Germans would say.

Mrs. Cleveland carries hers in her purse; and Mrs. Leland Stanford may not be forgotten in the matter, when one remembers that the beautiful antique, tiny image of St. Joseph and the Holy Infant which never leaves her pocket is the emblem of prosperity and good luck, according to the old Italian tradition.

BICYCLE PROVERBS.—One of the clever people has been at pains to invent a variety of proverbs for the benefit of bicycle riders. Here are a few of them Stolen bikes run fast.

Well tired—least tired.

A stone goes before a fall.

Bike while the craze is hot.

Bikers must not be musers.

A ring in time saves crime.

Too many bicycles spoil a walk.

Spare the pump and spoil the tyre.

Tired horses never grow weary.

It is no use sighing over spilt cycles.

Where there's a way there's a wheel.

Between two wheels you come to woe.

A seat unsound soon finds the ground.

A novice and her bike are soon parted.

Mount in haste and the dust you'll taste.

The lady cyclist has many spokes to her wheel.

The world's a cycle, and all society merely cyclists.

Look at others before you put on rational costume.

Never run over a magistrate; the pleasure is not worth the cost.

One man can set a beginner on a bicycle, but ten can't keep her there.

She that rideth uprightly rideth surely, but she that perverteth her way shall fall.

—Mail and Express.

WHEELMEN as a rule are inventive, as is shown by the fact that the chairman of the Western Passenger Association has been called upon for a ruling as to whether a bicycle in a trunk is subject to the special carrying charge which went into effect December 1st. He has decided it is not, though the charge will be made on wheels in crates or boxes. The next thing on the market will be trunks for bicycles and baby carriages. As weight is the basis of transportation rates for baggage, the question of size will cut no figure.

THE Queen of Italy has been taking a thorough course of instruction in bicycle riding, and rides to perfection, so say all who have had the pleasure of seeing her perform in her private park. As yet she has not appeared on the road, but has set the fashion to Italian ladies, and they are plentifully seen in public.

A MECHANICAL HORROR.—Machinery, a monthly journal published at Johannesburg, South Africa, gives an account of a most remarkable clock belonging to a Hindu prince, which the editor thinks the strangest piece of machinery in India. Near the dial of an ordinary-looking clock is a large gong hung on poles, while underneath, scattered on the ground, is a pile of artificial human skulls, ribs, legs, and arms, the whole number of bones in the pile being equal to the number of bones in twelve human skeletons. When the hands of the clock indicate the hour of one, the number of bones needed to form a complete human skeleton come together with a snap; by some mechanical contrivance the skeleton springs up, seizes a mallet, and walking up to the gong, strikes one blow. This finished, it returns to the pile and again falls to pieces. When two o'clock, two skeletons get up, and strike, while at the hours of noon and midnight the entire heap springs up in the shape of twelve skeletons, and strikes, each one after the other, a blow on the gong, and then fall to pieces, as before.

A VARIETY show had reached Boggo, and the local sky-pilot had let the school-room on condition that strict propriety was observed in the performance. "I assure you, sir," said the manager, "our entertainment is of the most refined and elevating character." "Mind," quoth the parson, "I'll be there myself, and at the slightest suggestion of anything wrong my man shall turn out the lights." The performance ran smoothly awhile until Tambo enquired, "Bones, can you tell me what is the most attractive thing in woman?" Before Bones could refer to her beautiful trust in man, her love for her children, etc., the voice of the shepherd was heard in the hall, crying, "If there's an answer to that question, out go the lights!"—Exchange.

"Now, who is that?" asked the dignified hen;
 "That chicken in white and gray?"
 She's very well dressed but from whence did she come?
 And her family, who are they?"
 "She never can move in our set, my dear,"
 Said the old hen's friend to her, later;
 "I've just found out—you'll be shocked to hear—
 She was hatched in an incubator."

A LIQUOR case was on trial, and one of the officers who had made the raid testified that a number of bottles were found on the premises. "What was in the bottles?" asked the judge of the witness. "Liquor, your honor." "What kind of liquor?" "I don't know, sir." "Didn't you taste it or smell of it?" "Both, your honor." "What! Do you mean to say that you are not a judge of liquor?" "No, sir; I'm not a judge; I'm only a policeman." The witness was excused from answering any further questions.—Green Bag.

THE TELEPHONE ON SHIPBOARD.—"Lately the first experiments with a telephonic connection between a war ship and the shore were made in Kiel, on the guard-ship Heinedal, and resulted very favorably," says Der Stein der Weisen (Vienna). "In future, accordingly, it will be possible for all the ships that lie near a buoy in Kiel harbor to be connected by telephone, not only with the telephone system of the city, but also with the other ships in harbor. The central office of the ship telephone system is in the torpedo depot. From a small temporary wooden building run wires through the water to the same buoy, so that the connection is thus made without trouble. If a vessel leaves its buoy, it disconnects the wire from the ship's telephone, and if it approaches one it makes connection. The communication of the ship with the different port authorities and with purveyors of provisions, hitherto fraught with so great inconvenience and delay, has by this innovation been greatly facilitated, and it is also of noteworthy use for signaling purposes."—Translated for The Literary Digest.

THE TINTS OF PEARL.—We have been taught to believe that the beautiful iridescence of pearls and mother-of-pearl is caused by striations or fine grooves on the surface of the naere, just as the iris of a dove's neck is due to the striations of the plumage; but according to Mr. C. E. Beuham, although a little of the color is produced in this way, most of it is caused by interference of the rays of light by reflection from the outer and inner surfaces of the thin layers of naere forming the substance of the pearl. The colors of a pearl have therefore a similar origin to those of a soap bubble, or the iridescence of ancient glass which has been scaled by time.

RANGE OF VISION ON WATER.—A man whose eyes are exactly 6 feet from the ground, standing on the beach so that the water just touches his feet, could see a ship at a distance of a little over two and three-quarter miles, and beyond this she would disappear. For each foot above the surface of the water you can see a little over one nautical mile, for each mile you can see eighty-three and a half nautical miles. People who go long voyages on ships are always surprised at the small number of other vessels they meet. But the simple explanation of this fact is the really very limited range of vision one has from a ship's deck.

EFFECT OF TELEPHONE UPON HEARING.—"A peculiar effect of the use of the telephone," said a telephone company official the other day, "is the increased acuteness of the left ear. The sensitiveness of the left ear is abnormally developed by frequent telephone practice, and the right ear, not generally used, shows a marked deterioration in the ability to discern sound. Put the transmitter to your right ear, and then you will realize how much the sense of hearing has been sharpened in the other organ."—Philadelphia Record.

THE LATEST IN MENU CARDS.—New menu cards come in the form of fruits and vegetables, such as apples, pears, potatoes, cucumbers and lemons. They are colored like the natural fruits, and the menu is written on the other side. The cards are fastened to a piece of satin ribbon, on which is printed the name of the guest.—Philadelphia Record.

OUR Life in the Present.—Enjoy the blessings of this day, if God sends them; and the evils of it bear patiently and sweetly; for this day is only ours, we are dead to yesterday, and we are not yet born to the morrow. —Jeremy Taylor.

P. N. LILIENTHAL }

THE aged Theodore Tilton, who was one of the most earnest American patriots when he lived in this country, recently, has written a long letter to Elizabeth Lady Stanton on the occasion of her eightieth birthday. While it refers chiefly to Woman's Rights, there is one very noble paragraph which runs as follows:

"Writing as I do from Europe, and as a student of the slow politics and of the sluggish progress of the Old World, I more than ever hate the feudal system, and I more than ever scorn the hereditary principle of monarchic government. Nevertheless, just across 'the Silver Streak'—and distant hardly a half-day's journey from where I live—there is a lady now nearly of your own age, who for the last fifty or more years—(a period coincident with your own public career)—has furnished, in corroboration of your own political philosophy, a continuous example of woman's fitness for the loftiest of political responsibilities. I refer to the venerated occupant of the British throne; who, I make bold to say, has surpassed any and every king, emperor, prince and masculine ruler of our time in the unbroken success of a reign which, as a woman, she has rendered phenomenal by her never-failing good sense, by her unerring judgment and by her exemplary life.

"I will venture a prediction. All Europe is now an armed camp. Five nations may find themselves in a whirl and fury of war in thirty days. When are we to see a universal disarmament? It will be when our military madness shall be cowed down by woman's voice; when our murderous politics shall be softened by woman's spirit; and when our international law shall be leavened by woman's wit."

From so stern a sans-culotte as Tilton, this is a remarkable acknowledgment.

—In estimating the efficiency of the United States navy considerable allowance has to be made for the fact that a very large number of men in the American war-ships are Englishmen, and it is not credible that all of them would fight against their own countrymen; indeed, although serving under another flag, the majority would, we have no hesitation in saying, be too patriotic to serve against their own country, and would find a means of leaving the service, says Court Journal. The crews of American war-ships are a hybrid lot. For instance, the Chicago's complement is made up of Englishmen, Danes, Swedes, Dutchmen, Germans, Spaniards, Frenchmen, Russians, and negroes, native-born Americans, numbering, perhaps, one-fourth of the ship's crew.

—A Madagascan correspondent of a Paris paper gives the latest particulars of the invasion of that hapless island by French soldiers, and sums up by bestowing the glory of the war entirely upon McInite; it was the bombs filled with that explosive which committed the havoc that caused the Queen to hoist a white flag. The first bomb that fell at five minutes past three in the courtyard of the Palace, we are told, killed twenty-six Hovas; the second bomb which fell in the court at ten minutes past three killed eighteen Hovas; the bomb that fell at a quarter past three killed forty soldiers and wounded a hundred; at nineteen minutes past three the Queen, fearing the result of the extra minute, hoisted the signal which proclaimed her defeat.

—The Gaulois tells its readers of an English custom observed on Christmas eve, which reads really a little bit like news. All the young girls assemble round a large punch bowl, the liquid is then set fire to, and in that flamboyant condition is ladled out into small and exceedingly thin glasses, rivalling the renowned Venetian glass. It is all the better if a girl's glass breaks in her hand, as she is thus certain to get married before the end of the next year.

WHAT'S Edison's best skill against the foe
Compared with Biere's black and blatant ink?
Why, with a squirt he can a navy sink,
Or drown an army in its prattling flow.

His pen is mightier than his sword we know,
And yet, sometimes, we are disposed to think
That his pen pellets are but balls of stink,
Such as the Chinese at each other throw.

And when they break—let Britishers beware,
No smokeless powder sends them on their way,
But winged with wheezings of asthmatic breath,
Foetid and thick, they fill the atmosphere
With rank bewildering vapors that dismay,
And stretch the foe in suffocating death. L. A. R.

WOOD PRESERVING IN SWITZERLAND.—A simple, effective, and cheap way of preserving wood from decay is practised in Switzerland in the preparation of posts for the telegraph service. A square tank, having a capacity of some 200 gallons, is supported at a height of 20 feet or 25 feet above the ground by means of a light skeleton tower built of wood. A pipe drops from the bottom of the tank to within 30 inches of the ground, where it is connected with a cluster of flexible branches, each ending with a cap having an orifice in the centre. Each cap is clamped on to the larger end of a pole in such a manner that no liquid can escape from the pipe except by passing into the wood. The poles are arranged parallel with one another, sloping downwards, and troughs run under both ends to catch drippings. When all is ready, a solution of sulphate of copper, which has been prepared in the tank, is allowed to descend the pipe. The pressure produced by the fall is sufficient to drive the solution, gradually, of course, right through the poles from end to end. When the operation is ended, and the posts dried, the whole of the fibre of the wood remains permeated with the preserving chemical.—Work.

LIVELY IN IMAGINATION.—Bridget O'Hoolihan, an elderly Irish cook, had been induced to go to a quiet little suburban town to live in a wealthy gentleman's family. Two weeks after her arrival she declared her intention of returning to the city. "Why do you leave us, Bridget?" asked her mistress, in a grieved tone; "we pay you the very highest wages." "Ye do, ma'am, an' yer a perfect leddy. Oi'm not lavin' troo anny fault av de fam'ly, but this place is such a dead old place, wid no chance to do anything lovelly in it, that, hegorry, oi have to mek up a pack o' lies iv'ry time oi go to confession, or oi'd have nothing to confess!"—Current Literature.

CHARLEY'S DAY OFF.—General Joseph E. Johnston, the Confederate commander, now dead, used to relate that in the hottest part of one of the early battles of the Civil War he felt his coat-tails pulled. Turning about, he recognized a young man who had been employed in his tobacco factory previous to enlistment. "Why are you not in your place fighting?" the general demanded, angrily. "Why, I just wanted to tell you that, if you don't mind, I reckon I will take my day off to-day!"—Current Literature.

PADEREWSKI'S CHERRIES.—A lady visiting Paderewski's villa in Paris recently, noticed a cherry-stone on the mantelpiece. She took possession of it, and had it set in pearls and diamonds as a relic of the master. A few weeks later Paderewski met this lady, who, in the course of conversation, showed him the cherry-stone with its elegant setting. "But, madam," said Paderewski, stroking his locks, "I never eat cherries. The one you found on the mantelpiece must have been left by my servant!"—Current Literature.

COLONEL Sutherland was in Chicago during the week on his way West to this city.

"For me," said Theophile Gautier, "the new found oyster is more wealthy than the pearl in its shell!" Moraghan, in the California Market, believes him, and supplies them.

The latest and the best brand out.

THERE was a good bit of grumbling engaged in last week that the earlier portion of it should have been so comparatively barren of events, and so much crowded into Friday. To be sure, Mrs. Foute's card party was composed mainly of elderly ladies belonging to her husband's congregation, and, therefore, hardly counted with the buds; but there were two luncheons, the teas of Mrs. George Pope and Miss Eleanor Woods, the McMonagle dinner party, Mrs. Sam Knight's second "at home," the cotillion at Miss Grace Sabin's, the Friday Fortnightly gathering, and the dinner dance given by the officers of the "Adams," at Mare Island, which was attended by several from the city.

Miss Cora Smedburg's tea last week was one of the pleasantest of the month. Miss Frances Curry's bud luncheon the same day was in honor of Miss Virginia Belknap, of Nevada, who was also chief guest at the Sabin cotillion, which was one of the prettiest of the present season. The national figures, of which there were five, representing America, France, Germany, Ireland, and Spain, were novel, and the favors were appropriate to the countries. Miss Sabin and George Gardiuer were the leaders, and acquitted themselves remarkably well; supper was served at à la carte tables at midnight, after which there was general dancing till a late hour.

One of Oakland's belles, Miss Jessie Glasscock, was the leading feature at the dance of the Friday Fortnightlies last week, as she assisted Mr. Allan Wright in his first attempt as cotillion leader, and the figures they introduced were among the prettiest danced this season.

The "Chimmie Fadden" reading at the Christian Association Hall, on Saturday afternoon, was well attended. Mrs. S. M. Van Wyck gave a tea to welcome Miss Averill on her return from abroad, and in the evening the dance of the Saturday Night Club brought the week to a pleasant conclusion. On Sunday Mrs. Bixler gave her monthly Sunday musicale. The selections were purely classical in character—Miss Sophie Newlands, the vocalist of the occasion, Mrs. C. Carr and Messrs. Beel and Heine the instrumentalists.

The wedding on Tuesday evening of Miss Gertrude Naphthaly and L. B. Feigenbaum at the Concordia Club was one of the most beautifully arranged bridal that has ever taken place in this city. The spacious rooms of the Club—used thus for the first time for such an event—afforded an opportunity which the decorators were not slow to take advantage of, and the result was a charming effect which won murmurs of admiration from all. Light, that powerful factor in a brilliant scene, was introduced by means of tiny incandescent lamps strung along ropes of smilax and hung from chandelier to chandelier, their varied hues looking like illuminated flowers. It was the bridal bower, however, which won the chief expressions of delight; it was formed of blue and white gauze in folds draped towards the centre, from which hung the marriage bell composed of camellias, hyacinths, and white rose buds; the tongue of the bell had a colored lamp hidden amid the flowers. The front of the bower was ornamented by a broad white ribbon tied in a true-lovers knot, and from each end at the sides hung a smaller bell. The filling in of a background of ferns and smilax at the back and sides was charming in contrast with the snowy white, a large star at the back being surrounded by electric lamps. Altogether the scene was one never surpassed in our society. The guests were received upon arrival by Mr. Naphthaly and Maurice Schmidt, and seated in semi-circles awaited the coming of the bridal cortege; promptly on time the Rev. Rabbi Voorsanger appeared and with the groom and his best man, Julius Feigenbaum, took positions under the canopy of the bower. When the strains of the Lohengrin chorus announced the coming of the bridal party, first appeared Maurice Schmidt's little daughter Aimée, looking like a veritable fairy in white silk. From her waist was a broad band of white ribbon, the ends of which were held by a little girl in pink, Miss Ernie Clayburg, and Master Robbie Roos. Then followed the ushers, J. M. and Samuel Naphthaly, George Roos, and Morris Lowenstein, two and two, and then the bridesmaids, the Misses May Schlessinger, Rose Goslinsky, Hilda Brown, Mabel Gerst, Edith Schmidt, and Elsie Cook, and the Maid of Honor, Miss Dorothy Hermann. Last of all appeared the fair bride, and every eye was upon her as she walked slowly forward leaning upon the arm of her father, and joined the group in the bower. The ushers took positions on the side behind the bridesmaids, the children in front; the whole effect was a delightful one. After the ceremony was completed by Rabbi Voorsanger, congratulations were in order, after which there was dancing until midnight, when a magnificent supper was served by Ludwig in the banquet hall of the Club, which had been elaborately decorated with flowers and electric lights, the special feature being an immense monogram, F. and N. in golden iridescent lamps resting against a background of green foliage. Dancing was resumed after supper and kept up until daylight. The toilettes of the ladies were elegant in the extreme, and the display of jewels dazzling. The bride's gown was of heavy white satin with a long train over which the tulle veil hung in fleecy folds; rare old family lace was used in draping the low necked bodice. She wore a girdle of orange blossoms and carried a bouquet of the same mingled with lilies of the valley. The maid of honor wore white silk trimmed with lace; the pretty bridesmaids were all gowned in pink silk and carried bouquets of La France roses. Mrs. Naphthaly, mother of the bride, wore a robe of pearl colored brocade satin trimmed with point lace and a profusion of diamonds; Mrs. Morris Schmidt, Mrs. Anspacher, and the Mesdames J. and B. Feigenbaum were especially noticeable for their exquisite gowns. Mrs. Schmidt's sapphires were also very beautiful. Owing to the serious illness of the groom's father his mother was also absent from the marriage festivities of their son. The newly wedded couple will reside with the Naphthals at their home on Post street.

To-day the Hecht residence will be the scene of a dual silver wedding celebration, the participants being Colonel and Mrs. M. H. Hecht and Mr. and Mrs. Louis P. Wiell, both couples having been married in Baltimore on the same day twenty-five years ago. The Walter-Merteif nuptials will be one of the events of Tuesday next, taking place at the home of the bride on Van Ness avenue. The dance given at the Simon residence on Saturday evening was made the occasion for the announcement of Miss Stella Greenbaum's engagement to Alfred Simon; and among other recently made known engagements are those of Miss Jennie Cheeseman and W. H. Schumacher; Miss Carrie Heller and I. Fleishman; Miss Henrietta Sullivan and S. L. Harris.

The wedding of Miss Sophie Kaufman and Frank Bowers was a home ceremony on Monday last at the Kaufman residence, on Mason street, only relatives and intimate friends being present.

Luncheons have taken a leading place this week, Mrs. Theodore Payne appearing first on the programme, her party on Monday being composed of married ladies only. Mrs. Robert Fry's luncheon on Tuesday was in compliment to Miss Belle Graut, the bride-elect of young Pond, and her company were an equal number of maids and matrons to the number of two score. Miss Lottie Wood's luncheon on Wednesday had Miss Mattie Whittier, who has recently returned from Europe, as a guest of honor.

The event of the week was the Leap Year bal pondre of the Friday Night Cotillion Club last night; the Leap Year cotillion of the Friday Fortnightly Club will not take place until the 7th of February, the last meeting before Lent.

Mr. E. A. Wiltze, who, in London, has been taking such a prominent part in efforts for the safety of Johu Hays Hammond in South Africa, was a well known figure in San Francisco society a couple of seasons ago, as he was quite a popular beau with the girls during his frequent visits to the city from Auburn, where he was in charge of mining property.

Last Saturday afternoon a fashionable coterie responded to the cards issued by Mrs. J. H. Jewett, announcing the appearance at her house of Miss Lillian O'Connell in a monologue. This clever and very pretty young woman made her debut less than two years ago under the auspices of the New York Chapter of the Daughters of the Revolution, at their entertainment at the Waldorf Hotel, given upon the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington. Her remarks upon Colonial Days were graphic and often piquant, her interpretation of illustrative poems, bits of finished dramatic art. Mrs. Jewett gave her protégé the advantage of an excellent and picturesque stage-setting, complete in every detail. The entertainment concluded with musical selections by Miss Adler, Mr. Solomons, and Miss Pratt, and was voted a great success. The next recital takes place January 18th at 2 p. m., and illustrates Colonial life in New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

It is rather singular that with the well known fondness that so many of our residents possess for copying everything English, that Twelfth Night parties have this year been an almost unknown quantity. It was of a surety thought that Burlingame, at least, would have done something to honor that date. There were one or two gatherings in the city; among them the one held at the residence of Mr. Robert Bruce on Jackson street, when, after the King and Queen had been chosen in the persons of Lawrence Van Winkle and Miss F. Currey, games appropriate to the night were the chief feature, followed by supper and dancing, and a most delightful affair it proved to be.

Much to the regret of their friends on shore, the sailing of the flagship Philadelphia carried away the officers of that ship, who are among the most popular who have ever been on this station; and though they will doubtless return, it may not be just yet awhile, and at present they were much wanted in our social circles. There were several very pleasant breakfasts given on board prior to their departure, and the return of the Philadelphia will be looked forward to with pleasure whenever that may be.

Large dinners have been the rule this month, and they are apparently not deemed worthy the name unless there are from twenty-five to thirty guests thereat. Recent dinner hostesses include Mrs. William Haas, Mrs. Chauncey Winston, Mrs. J. F. Houghton, Mrs. McKenna, and Mrs. Sigmund Stern, whose dinner was in celebration of the wedding of Miss Elsie Meyer and Ahe Stern, which took place in New York the same day.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Newlands are again occupying their residence in Washington City, where their daughter, Miss Edith, is one of the buds of the present season in that gay capital. Mrs. Henry Scott, who is such an energetic and indefatigable traveler, meditates leaving us again in the near future. This time her destination will be Europe, whence she departs for a visit in about six weeks from now.

The Grand Ball of the Hellenic Society last Saturday night at Union Square Hall was a splendid success. But the prettiest feature was the patriotic speech delivered by the belle of the Greek Colony, Miss Anathasiadou, in honor of Greece and the United States.

Mrs. Charles Matthews gave a delightful Theatre party at the Baldwin last Monday night to a number of visiting Eastern friends. Afterwards there was a delicious supper.

A grand vaudeville and athletic entertainment for the benefit of the Olympic Club will take place at the Columbia Theatre on Monday evening, January 20th. Local talent and members of the club will take part.

The genial composer and Prince of Bohemia, W. S. Barton, author of so many famous songs, has just arrived from New York, and will visit us for two months.

Mr. J. H. Jahns and Mr. F. Dohrmann, Jr., of the firm of Nathan, Dohrmann & Co., left on Friday for the East and Europe.

Miss Gwendolin Oberton, of Los Angeles, is the guest of Mrs. Colonel Kimball at her residence on Pacific avenue.

Mrs. B. W. Paulsen intends to leave the end of this month for the East.

SENATOR Tracy L. Ford, the well known attorney, has withdrawn from the firm of Cross, Ford, Abbott & Kelly, and has taken offices at rooms 154 and 157, on the 8th floor of the Crocker Building. To day he leaves for Washington to urge the passage of an important bill relating to the tributaries of the San Joaquin and Sacramento Rivers. He will be absent about two months.

THE well-known firm of George Marcus & Co., at 232 California street, having retired from the agency of the Transatlantic Insurance Co., of Hamburg, at the end of the recent year, had a Christmas present of the city agency of the Commercial Union Assurance Co., of London, with its capital of over twelve millions and its splendid prestige.

The latest recruit in journalistic circles is Mr. Bert Spring, who has just been appointed sporting editor of the Report, although only fifteen years of age. He is a son of Mr. E. S. Spring, who has for years past been connected with the same paper.

"The President to 'sass' England." What a dignified remark for a Rabbi to make! He must surely have thought of his Vaterland's favorite delicacies (?), sassaages and lager beer.

THE APE AND THE THINKER.

OWEN WISTER in Moods.

Revolving deeply as he went
The controversy of Descent,
A Thinker chanced upon an Ape,
And after sundry meditations
Engendered by the creature's shape,
Exclaimed: "There's surely something in it!
This is no theory of the minute,
And you and I must be relations."

The monkey closed one weary lid,
And "Nay," he muttered, "God forbid!"
"What!" cried the man, "you with your tail
So humble in the social scale,
Say this? My friend, have you reflected
How good 'tis to be well connected?
Or else, if this world you despise,
And on the next one fix your eyes,
In such case, what are you to hope for?
For if the Scriptures are correct,
Life here is all you can expect.
Your good deeds will no angel hoarded,
You die forever unrewarded.
If Darwin's right, the soul I grope for
Is in some measure shared by you,
And thus we twain walk hand in hand
Joint tenants of the Promised Land."

"I firmly trust that is not true,"
Replied the melancholy beast;
"I've come to know this world at least,
And something also of your race;
And where among I have discerned
One human heart that sometimes burned
In pity for a brother's woe.
One man, confronted face to face
With troubles other than his own,
Who found the time to pause and spend
Some costly moments for a friend
Not deep, sad eyes devised for show,
Not easy sympathy, well told,
Not chilly gift or naked gold;
But moments he might ne'er regain,
Yet squandered them in cheerfulness
To heal some heart, to ease some moan;
For one, I say, to whom distress
Spoke and he turned, I have found ten
That marked the human cry of pain
And looked, but never looked again.
Cold selfishness comes not in Heaven;
Sinner are hot sins there forgiven.
Therefore," the Ape said, "on the whole
I hope we monkeys have no soul.
For, mark me, we could never live
Happy with your alternative:
You with your souls may win salvation,
But soulless Apes have no damnation."

SAN FRANCISCO NEWS LETTER California Advertiser.

Vol. LII.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1896.

Number 4.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT, 605-607-613 Merchant street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

IN the circus line there is nothing on the road equal in pleasing moral interest to Dr. Brown and Mattie Overman in one ring under one tent. Air for the band: "There are Others."

IF actresses didn't wear tights, and there were no dime museum freaks, and no social scandals, it appalls to think what would become of those great engines of morality and civilization, the Sunday newspapers.

IF there is any nation not yet heard from that wants a fight with the United States let it speak up, and the muzzle of Congress will be turned upon it. We can blow the earth out of the water with compressed air.

GOVERNOR Budd cannot be accused of using stilted language in the discharge of his official functions. It is related that at a meeting of the State Board of Examiners, the other day, he explained how the Los Angeles Board of Trade had opposed his bill to create a new Board of Examiners. But, he declared, "I've got 'em in the door now, and I'll pinch 'em till they squeal." The Governor does not propose to allow any monkeying with his prerogative—not to say perquisites. It's a Jim Budd and don't-you-forget-it administration, and those who do not stand in are fired out.

THE anti-lynching bill that has passed the House of Representatives of South Carolina seems worthy of adoption by all the States where a tendency to lynch-law exists. This measure provides that the county in which a lynching occurs shall be liable to a penalty of $2,000, to be recovered in a competent court by the legal representatives of the person lynched. This would be a just law, and its enforcement would go far to check an evil that disgraces many American States. When taxpayers find themselves liable in damages for every outrage of this character, lynch-law will soon become unpopular.

IF the gossips are to be believed, ex-President Harrison is not such an iceberg as he has been represented, and the White House narrowly escaped a scandal during his administration. But yet it is not to be supposed that the less glacial side of his nature was affected in other than a purely platonic way. All that was necessary to stir the depths of the General's consciousness was a feminine discovery of his greatness, coupled with a profound faith in his destiny as a foreordained "ruler" of the American people for a second term. He has a calm, serene confidence in his own intellectual eminence, and naturally confides in those who worship him.

THE announcement that, at the call of Mr. Hearst, our only Ambrose Bierce had departed for Washington, to direct national legislation on the Pacific railroads' debt, seems to have created no commotion in the great East. It is possible that President Huntington may have trembled in his shoes, but if so, no responsive quiver has been felt along the line of the Central Pacific in California. Only the Examiner appears to have taken the matter seriously. Now if brother Sutro would but pack his terrible grip, and likewise depart for the national capital, the elements of a grand opera bouffe combination at Washington would be almost complete.

THE average San Franciscan, each morning as he opens his newspaper and sees the serried columns of small type devoted to theological controversy, offers up humble thanks to God that, not being a Christian, he is under no obligation to read what the clergy are writing.

GOVERNOR Budd has cabled President Kruger begging him, presumably, not to hang Jack Hammond. The reply of the stern old Boer has not yet been received, and the worst fears are entertained. It ought to be possible to come to terms. Let the Governor offer to exchange General Diek for his brother, and California will uphold him. It is a dread alternative, but this people is willing to make sacrifices.

THE Rev. Father Yorke is a very clever controversialist, and tumbles his opponents over without trouble, but when the war of words shall have ended it is not likely that there will be more Catholics than when it began. In the meantime two facts obtrude themselves with distinctness. One is that San Francisco is made to seem to be in a mediæval condition intellectually, and the other is that Father Yorke, good man, is not one of the meek and lowly, but even as the worldly, being full of belligerence and damns. Wherefor Father Yorke is a stumbling block that should be blown up by his Bishop in the interest of peace and the progress of the faith.

THE appointment of Austin as poet laureate is quite a compliment to Lord Salisbury. A practical statesman is supposed to be unusually free from the poetic sentiment, for the possession of such sentiment would have prevented Salisbury from occupying the high position he does. His selection, therefore, of Mr. Austin, instead of shaking mankind's faith in his judgment, should strengthen the people's confidence in his ability as a statesman. Had he been given as much to poetry as to prose, William Watson, the laureate by virtue of merit, would have moved him to recite a bit of modern verse to the Sultan by mouth of England's cannon. True, from the muse's point of view it would be pleasanter to have a competent judge of poetry to select successors to Tennysons; for not every man who looks like a fool is a poet. Leaving the delicate task to statesmen, Shakespeare and the author of the "Mother Goose Rhymes" stand about an equal show for court favors.

IT is pleasant in these times, when religious exercises seem to lack participants, to know that the representatives of the great American people, in Congress assembled, are thoroughly in sympathy with prayer, and know how to comport themselves when their mouthpiece, the chaplain of the House, is addressing the Throne of Grace. It is the custom with over-ardent followers of the Lord to join loudly in prayerful amens to all properly expressed petitions. The other day the chaplain told the Lord about what the American people wished, and gave him information of what the rebels are doing in Cuba to overthrow the myrmidons of Spain, and closed his morning prayer with the hope that the Almighty would see things as the jingoes do, and help along the cause of republicanism versus monarchism. The House listened in breathless sympathy, and, as soon as they could get their work in, instead of uttering mild amens, multitudinously burst into a loud applause. This is a new fad in religious worship, but, as long as the Lord understands it, it is probably quite right.

PERILOUS BLUFFING.

A FEW words of calm good sense from Washington come like a whiff of cool air on a hot day. While so many members of Congress are vying with their neighbors in chewing gunpowder and exploding the bombs of warlike speech under the thrones of the effete despots of Europe, Senator Cullom gently remarks, in effect, that this nation is making a fool of itself. "The fact of the matter is," he says, "that we are not prepared for war with anybody, and the sooner Congress understands this and gets down to business the better. We cannot afford to provoke quarrels until we put ourselves in a position to defend ourselves if attacked." The indignation sure to be excited by language such as this from a Senator of the United States will be great. But it will be mild in comparison with the patriotic fury evoked by his further observation:

"We have imagined that no one was going to fight us, and that we were protected by our situation from the necessity of preparing for a conflict, but if a British flying squadron should suddenly make its appearance on our shores our attention would be called down to business."

Indeed it would. And if in addition to a British flying squadron the combined fleets of Europe should descend upon us, what should we do? That calamity is far from being an impossible one. We have entered upon a national policy that, if pursued, will inevitably result in a world wide coalition against us. If we shall stand by the position we have assumed—that the United States is the supreme dictator of the Western hemisphere, the other nations thereof being our wards—we shall in all probability soon be called on to make our claim good with the sword.

The protagonists of the new extension of the Monroe doctrine may be right or wrong, but in either case they will not be permitted to enforce the doctrine with words. They have radically altered our relations with the powers. Hitherto we have avoided quarrel with them, and grown great in population and wealth by practicing the arts and adhering to the maxims of peace. But now that we have determined to assert practical proprietorship to half the world the character of the republic must change. Only by force can we induce Europe to accept us in this imperial rôle. It will not do to trust to luck and the hope that our pretensions will not provoke armed protest.

The United States has long been the spoiled child in the family of nations. Without an army and only with the beginning of a navy, we have been dangerous merely in the possibilities inherent in the number of our people and our opulence. Moreover, we have not interfered with European policies, greed, and ambitions. We have been on one side, as it were, and as our occasional threats and constant vauntings have injuriously affected no foreign interests, a good-natured tolerance has been shown us—a tolerance which has had amusements and some contempt in it. Our unwarlike state, so truly described by Senator Cullom, has been our best protection, for a nation that is not ready to fight is not regarded as being in earnest when it talks fight. Yet we have got it into our modest heads that the world is afraid of us.

The world would have reason to be afraid were the United States to stop talking of its illimitable resources and go earnestly to work applying some of those resources to the construction of a mighty navy and the organization of a first-class army—if we should fortify our coasts and in all ways model ourselves upon the nations on the other side of the Atlantic which go armed to the teeth. And until we do that we shall not be justified in taking the tone sounded by the President's Venezuela message and echoed by Congress and the press.

We have, of course, the men and money wherewith to fight magnificently—if that money had only been applied and the men organized. But suppose England were tomorrow to become as bloodthirsty as Congress seems to be and should declare war, where would we be? And if other powers should join her in armed opposition to the new Monroe doctrine, what would be our plight? Those who live in sea coast cities have special reasons for doing some thinking on this head.

England is becoming exasperated. The London Globe tells the United States Senate that "the English people will not stand much more fooling from anybody," and warns us that we may easily find ourselves "face to face with a situation that could be called appalling."

The sum of the matter is that if the United States means to fight it should drop oratory and get ready for fighting. Of bluffing we have already had more than enough for our safety and dignity.

A South African Eye-Opener. The indignation of the American press at the popularity of Dr. Jameson in England is a proof of how easy it is to be virtuous when there is no temptation to be otherwise. What! Make a hero of a villain who raided the peaceable and unoffending Boers? The column rules of our newspapers trembled with just anger at such moral turpitude in the British. What Dr. Jameson deserved was a rope and a tree in the Transvaal. Any interference on the part of the English Government to save him from that, or whatever fate the Boers might see fit to inflict, would be infamous.

But it develops that there were some Americans in that far country who were involved in Jameson's enterprise, and that they have been thrown into prison. The Boer horn is in the side of our ox. So Oom Paul is bombarded with telegrams, and the English Government has been requested by our own to use its good offices in behalf of the infamous Jameson's American confederates.

Let us hope that President Kruger is as sensible and patient a man as he has been pictured, and that the courts of his republic are as just as their repute, for we Americans have been guilty of an enormous impertinence in our clamors regarding our imperiled countrymen. We have not inquired if they are guilty, we have not assumed that they will be fairly dealt with; we have simply rushed forward and asked for their rescue, as if they had fallen into the hands of savages and were necessarily blameless. What we have pleaded for, practically, is that Americans in the Transvaal shall not be held responsible for their acts or required to suffer the penalty of the law of the country if they have offended against it. What would we think of President Kruger if he should claim a like immunity for the citizens of his republic were any of them to come over here and commit crimes against the Government of the United States?

We have a right to demand that American citizens in the Transvaal, and everywhere else, shall equally with other men be treated justly under the laws there obtaining, but more than that we have no right to ask. American citizenship is not, as seems to be thought in some quarters, a license to a man to rove about the world doing as he pleases, regardless of foreign laws and customs. It is natural that we should be sympathetically concerned when men whom we know and respect get into trouble in distant lands—just as natural as that the English should admire Jameson for his lawless courage and audacity—but none the less we must place our common sense above our sympathetic emotions, and bring ourselves to understand that we are not warranted in requesting the nations of the globe to suspend the operation of their laws for the benefit of sojourning Americans. Those who have fallen afoot of Boer statutes are, with Dr. Jameson, entitled to a fair trial, and that is all.

Church Morals. One Dr. Brown does the churches more harm than many Ingersolls. It is unfortunate for the churches that when a Dr. Brown appears they make the worst possible use of him. Instead of being eager to bring him to full exposure and justice, they obey a mindless instinct of self-preservation, and seek to protect him, as if his cause were their own. Thus are the churches browned all over by the fire that should roast only the clerical delinquent.

The public has long ago made up its mind as to Dr. Brown on the evidence presented by the press, yet the authorities of his sect have got no further than to pray for his speedy restoration to health, and to consult him as to how he shall be tried. Meantime, Dr. Brown has Miss Mattie Overman beneath his roof, carefully guarded from reporters, and, doubtless, the good man spares some time from the preparation of his own judiciously tardy statement to the brethren in order to assist her in preparing hers.

The fact that the writer of the Tunnell letters is in Dr.

Brown's house, in Dr. Brown's charge, would be enough to satisfy the secular mind as to the sort of person Dr. Brown is. The inference is as plain as the police draw when they catch a man coming out of the window of a house not his own, and discover a full kit of burglar's tools in his possession. But the secular mind is not like the regenerated mind. Seemingly, it has not occurred to any of the ministers or deacons who are to be Dr. Brown's judges to infer anything from Miss Mattie's nearness to her beloved pastor, which to the worldly presents itself as a piece of effrontery so magnificent as to excite their awe and wonder. Among the brethren, indeed, there is evident a profound sympathy with their afflicted colleague. They pray for him as one who is going through the fiery furnace of persecution. The grace of God may give a peace that passeth all understanding, but it also frequently deprives the human mind of capacity for thinking. There is Brother Pond—the Rev. Pond—for example, who, though he is to sit in judgment, gives it out that he believes Brother Brown is all right because Brother Brown has asked for a trial. To the powerful intellect of Brother Pond it is clear that Brother Brown would not do that unless he were innocent.

In itself, the circumstance that a clergyman now and again is discovered to be a scoundrel would do religious no harm if the churches acted rationally. Obviously, theirs is the greatest interest in getting rid of him, and sending him forth placarded as a traitor. But because they halt and shuffle, and shield and excuse, they awaken the scorn and aversion of straight-thinking people who, though not of the household of faith, are decent and intelligent. It cannot be but that the First Congregational Church, and the other churches, through it, will be hurt by this Brown scandal, for the delay in action has made it seem that public opinion has forced reluctant proceedings. Thus will be confirmed the worldly impression that the partisanship of piety too often blinds the moral perceptions of God's people, and so renders them worse instead of better than folk who have not had the light of the Gospel shed abroad in their hearts, but who retain unimpaired their natural ability to discriminate between right and wrong. When a man of the kind that Dr. Brown has been proved to be is not avoided like a leper and cast forth by his congregation, how can modest women or honest men regard the church which he has defiled as a place clean enough for themselves and their children? And how can such men and women be persuaded that religion confers a higher moral standard, a superior sensitiveness of soul?

The churches of San Francisco are suffering, and will continue to suffer, vicarious atonement for the sins of Dr. Brown. And it will serve them right for not having crucified him the instant he was found out.

The Commission Has Begun Well. Americans are to be congratulated upon the manner in which the Venezuela Commission has proceeded with its duties. The letter of its President,

Justice Brewer, to Secretary Olney, suggesting the appointment of agents or attorneys by England and Venezuela, to represent the rival claims before the Commission, is admirable in the tact and courtesy it displays. It opens the way for a graceful acknowledgment by England of the invitation thus extended, and yet acquiescence in the request will not in any way bind either party to the dispute to recognize the correctness of the conclusions reached by the Commission. The moral effect of the inquiry, conducted in the manner proposed, must, however, be very great. Should England and Venezuela both be officially represented before the Commission and each side thus have full opportunity to be heard, the judgment of such a body will have great weight with the world at large. It will certainly be conclusive, so far as American opinion is concerned. Should it decide against the British claim, there appears to be no escape from the conclusion that our Government must be prepared to back up the findings, even though the result would inevitably be war with England. President Cleveland and Congress have gone too far in the matter to recede. An adverse decision, likewise, would put Great Britain in an exceedingly awkward position. While in no way bound to recognize the Commission, and in fact denying even the right of the United States to intervene in the difficulty, England must either act in harmony with the verdict or incur war with the United States. The truth is that this Commission is charged with a tremendous responsibility, and its judgment may be attended with the most far-reaching consequences. Should Congress, in the meantime, define the Monroe doctrine on such lines as those presented in the resolution of Senator Davis, England must promptly back down or fight. The Davis resolution goes farther than any previous attempt to law down the Monroe doctrine on arbitrary lines. While reaffirming this national policy, as expressed by President Monroe in 1823, it adds to it an element of the greatest uncertainty. What was before in no way obscure would by the resolution of Senator Davis be left altogether indefinite. It does not specifically define the cases to which the Monroe doctrine would apply, but virtually makes any given act of a foreign power, with relation to territory on this hemisphere, subject to the approval of the United States. It would be a dangerous resolution to adopt, for, whatever may be thought of the inherent rights of this country in the premises, it is to be remembered that the nation should not commit itself to a declaration that it is not prepared at all times to enforce against any and all foreign powers. The "war spirit" at Washington just now is like new wine working in an old leathern bottle—it threatens a rupture disastrous to all concerned.

The Detective Conscience. It would be agreeable for the tax-payers to find out about when it was determined that a detective policeman is to be paid his salary simply for the honor he confers on the city by filling the office, and that he is not to do any work as a detective until he is bought to do it by a direct offer of money or the chance of getting a reward offered by the State. It was a pretty spectacle offered citizens when Lees went before the State Board of Examiners in Sacramento to not only keep those who furnished evidence to convict Kovalev, from getting the reward of $1,000 offered by the State, but to claim it all for himself. Lees was simply a policeman hired to do his duty—that is, to go and find the scoundrel through information furnished by several others. These several others brought the information. He used it. The man was arrested, tried, and convicted by means of that information. Now Lees, in the language of the people, wants to "hog" it all, and leave the poor fellows, without whose aid the detective could have done nothing, to suck their thumbs on the outside, and admire the sagacity of the great detective in ferreting out the criminal and pocketing the spoils. To give Lees a cent of this would he simply to encourage a sluggard officer in doing nothing to earn his salary. It would, moreover, break the word of promise given by the State. It would make vain any future offers of reward, if the policeman who joins the pieces of information together is to take the gain from those who give the information. The fact that such a claim, is set up to prove that a detective's conscience is a thing unknown. To grant him the reward will stultify the State, corrupt the detective force, and paralyze the action of all outsiders whose services are alone of any value to the people. Instead of allowing Lees any of the reward, there should be a fair distribution of it among those whose services were efficient, and the next Legislature should pass a law forbidding, under penalty, the receipt by any policeman of any compensation for doing the duties of his office, other than the salary received from the Government that employs him.

A New Fuel And What It Suggests. The adoption of petroleum for fuel in the Pacific Rolling Mills is an important change in local manufacturing industries, and is likely to prove the first step in a general new departure. It is estimated that these works alone will consume about one hundred thousand barrels of oil yearly. The late developments in the production of petroleum in Southern California are thus bearing good fruit in this quarter. The high cost of fuel has hitherto been a serious drawback to manufacturing in San Francisco, but with an abundant supply of a cheap and highly concentrated fuel, such as petroleum, to draw upon, increased prosperity and activity in this field of enterprise may now be expected. While Los Angeles is finding here a good market for oil, it is an example of the natural reciprocity of trade that this same fuel is being used at our rolling mills for the production of iron-work on two large contracts from the southern city, resulting from the construction of a fire-proof building and a street railway viaduct. The progress of Los Angeles has of late years furnished much employment to labor here, in similar ways, and the fact indicates that, directly and indirectly, this city is benefited by the growth of other communities in California. Their expansion naturally brings to us construction and other work which may be done here more economically than elsewhere, because of certain advantages and facilities flowing from San Francisco's location, large population and established manufactories, particularly those of iron and steel and others requiring large capital and costly machinery. Our merchants and manufacturers should be taking heart from these circumstances, and making a more diligent canvass of the tributary territory for advantageous connections. It is a false idea that the growth of Los Angeles, or of any other center of local trade in this State, is necessarily detrimental to this city. Whether loss or benefit results to San Francisco depends upon what our people may do with the opportunities afforded them. If they are content to fold their hands, rely on natural advantages, and wait for something to thrup up in the way of new trade and industry, they are certain to find themselves left far behind in the race of progress. In the competition for new business that is bringing Chicago and St. Louis more and more into direct rivalry with San Francisco for the trade of the Pacific Coast, our merchants and manufacturers are obliged to keep their eyes open, and to follow the brisk methods of their Eastern competitors, or else drop farther and farther behind. If a little of the petroleum of enterprise were ignited under all the easy chairs on Front, Battery and Sansome streets, the result might be a glow of healthful activity, a stir of new life, all along the line.

Department of the Bar. The dignity of the bench and the bar is a considerable part of the due administration of the law. In older communities it exists as something for citizens to take pride in.

In later ones there is often enough such a plentiful lack of it, that the observer may be a little in doubt whether he is in a court of justice, a primary ward meeting, or a circus. Mr. Charles Wesley Reid, who is permitted to be called a lawyer, may know how to address a popular gathering called to denounce the awful immorality of the pool-room, but, when he gets before a judge, his attitude is something for clowns to stare at, but not to imitate. His massive brain, doubtless, makes him a bit top-heavy, so he balances himself imperfectly till he can get a table to lean against, until, as his interrogatories to the witness exhaust his strength, he finally flops down upon the table, pulls one leg under him, and, from this improvised empuce, continues the practice of the law. It may be his Honor, Judge Hebbard, is indifferent to the deportment of the bar, but, if lawyers are allowed to pose thus in all the court rooms without censure, both judges and lawyers may forever cease to wonder if laymen lose a decent respect for the administrators of the law, and show by their attitudes that they can better the instruction.

Ships That Pass In a Decade. It is said that any one of England's first-class battle ships could send to the bottom in a few minutes a dozen of what were considered her best war vessels eleven years ago. This is because of the tremendous power of the big guns that have come into use, as well as the great improvements in armor. What was regarded as impregnable in 1886 is now easily pierced by rifled guns. But this remarkable advance, in the course of ten or a dozen years, naturally excites the inquiry as to what will be the value of the present war ships ten or twelve years from now. Is it not probable that they, too, will be considered obsolete, as are at this time the naval invincibles of an earlier date? The nation that undertakes to maintain the strongest navy is saddled with an enormous outlay, which must be steadily increased to keep pace with the rapidly advancing cost of armor and armament. This is England's present position, but recent events have demonstrated that her naval policy is wise, however expensive and burdensome to the British taxpayer. Her superior naval strength fairly cowed the truculent young German Emperor, who, in the face of England's preparations for war, dared not maintain the defiant and insulting attitude he had assumed in the South African matter. Now he is making himself ridiculous by a demand for a big German navy, to be composed of wooden ships. Such vessels might gratify by their numbers and show of strength the egregious vanity of the young "war lord," but would of course be worthless for fighting purposes. In the present state of naval development, it seems clear that a few battle ships of the first class are of infinitely more value to any nation, for actual fighting purposes, than any number of inferior vessels, alike vulnerable and feeble in armament. The policy of the United States should be to waste no money on the construction of weak ships, in the foolish notion that there is safety in mere numbers. What we seem to most need is a big fleet of torpedo boats, and a liberal equipment of torpedoes for all our seaports. If the late excitement over Venezuela taught any lesson at all, it was that of proceeding at once for the thorough defence of our coasts and harbors. The present Congress should make an appropriation large enough to enable the War and Navy Departments to proceed immediately with the plans that have been adopted for the proper defence of our shores. The people do not desire a big navy for aggressive display in foreign waters, but they are practically united in support of a thorough provision for coast defence. The folly of relying on "reserve powers," our "unbounded resources," and other nonsense of the same character, is speedily dissipated when a prospect of war arises with some foreign power possessing a formidable navy.

Pull Together For The Needed Canal. Warner Miller, President of the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company, is quoted as saying that if Congress does not, at its present session, take decisive action towards the building and control of the Nicaragua canal by the United States Government, the company will proceed to seek European capital for its construction. This may be regarded as in the nature of what is commonly called a bluff. Miller well knows that European capital cannot be had for the undertaking, under present conditions. If the canal is to be built at all, it must be done by our Government, or with its express consent or cooperation. The chief obstacle of late years has been the demand of the existing company for a certain share of ownership in the Government work, because of the concessions held by the corporation and on account of the outlay it made in Nicaragua some time ago. The time has come for Congress to deal energetically and earnestly with this subject. The canal is a great national want, and of enormous importance to the Pacific coast. There is nothing in which the people of California are or should be more interested, for it would mean to them a vastly greater demand for their products, with resulting benefits to all interests in the State. Through the new water-way direct shipments of fruits, vegetables and other products of the soil could be made by steamships to the Atlantic ports of the United States as well as to Europe. A multitude of new markets would be at once opened, and trade with foreign countries would quickly spring into enormous proportions. San Francisco, by means of the canal, would begin to realize her destiny as the chief port of the Pacific, and the future of the whole coast would appear brightened and secure. If our people could be aroused to a sense of the overwhelming importance of this canal, and to take the united and earnest action that the subject demands, it might be possible to urge Congress into effective legislation during the present session. But, as usual, the attention of our public is distracted by things of comparatively small concern. As a matter of fact, there has been more effort in California this winter to secure an appropriation for the opening of navigation between Red Bluff and Redding, on the upper Sacramento river, than to bring about the construction by the Government of the sorely needed canal from ocean to ocean.

ALL through the past week Sue had been oddly happy. Her little boy had not had a touch of that hateful croup for a long time, now; and Luke Galt, her husband, had got work at last. He had not drank a drop for three whole months, but the hard times, added to his knowy vice, had kept him from securing work. Everybody had seemed to remember that on three different occasions he had been discharged for drunkenness. In vain he declared that he would never again touch liquor; in vain his handsome, healthful face gave support to this avowal. "You're an excellent workman; we know about you," one superintendent has kindly said. "You ought to have been a foreman, by this time. But there's no trusting you, I hear. You'll keep straight as a string for two, three, four months, and then your demon will grip you again. Besides, we're discharging hands, just now, anyway. So good-morning, Luke Galt; good-morning."

Luke was proud, in his way, and it cost him a keen pang to beg for work in the name of his starving wife and child. But he did beg for it in these terms, and at length he got it, too. Eleven dollars a week seemed a god-send now. Last year he would have laughed in the face of any one who had offered it to him.

To-night was Saturday night, and by ten minutes past six o'clock Sue began to grow nervous. Always that horror was over her. Each tick of the big kitchen clock gave her a deeper stab. Willie, expecting his father, had been placed in his high-chair at the supper-table, near Luke's empty seat. He was a pale, flaxen-haired child, looking younger than his real age, which was barely five years. Sue worshipped him, and was always dreading the insidious croup, from which he had already suffered several fierce attacks, would one day snatch him from her jealous arms.

His seizures had always come like lightning. The first had stricken him when Luke and she were far more prosperous than now. A physician of great eminence had then given her a certain prescription, which she had ever since carefully guarded. "It will save him if anything does," the famous New York doctor had said; "but much will depend upon its being used very promptly."

Sue looked at the clock, and then sought solely to busy herself with the sliced meat frying on the stove. Soon she sturdily dished the meat, and set it on the table, trying hard not to let her eyes wander toward the clock again, but hearing, somehow, that it was quarter past six, in spite of her piteous effort.

She and Luke had only a bedroom and kitchen in this downtown tenement-house whither want had drifted them. She loathed the building and the street. Both were full of grimy Italians, with a sprinkling of Germans almost equally coarse. Luke's recent good fortune had thrilled her with a passionate hope that they might soon find themselves in cleaner and better quarters. He was to bring home his week's wages that night—ten blessed, helpful dollars. One dollar he had borrowed from a fellow-workman last Tuesday, and given it to his wife. Sue had not a cent of it left.

She went into the front bedroom, after putting the meat on the table and cutting a few pieces off the bread-loaf bought that afternoon with the very last of her money. All day the weather had been growing gustier and wilder. It had now roughened into a fierce January blizzard. The window-panes were so coated with frozen sleet that she could not see at all beyond them. The wind outside had begin to shudder and scream. If he had been at home she would not have minded the sound. Now it pierced her more dismally than those relentless clock-ticks.

On a sudden she heard another sound, that made her start and turn. She had not heeded Willie for the last few minutes. He was always a quiet child. He had wanted to be put in his high-chair, and she had let him have his way. He had seemed, while she dished the meat, to be playing harmlessly enough with the knife and fork before him, grasping the handle of each in either pale little hand and striking one against the other with listless slashes.

In a trice Sue darted back to where he sat. His head had fallen sidewise; his face had got a chalky tinge; from his throat came the muffled, stertorous rattle that she knew so well.

She caught him in her arms and flew back with him to the bedroom. She laid him on the bed, and then applied what immediate remedies she remembered. But these were not enough. The prescription! She hurried to a bureau drawer and found the bottle which had contained it when last made up. Not a drop was left! But the paper—she knew where to find that. With slight trouble she did find it.

The only apothecary for many streets away was Zundorf, a German, notoriously gruff and unkind. Wrapping a stout shawl over her head, Sue slipped downstairs, and out into the blinding whirls of snow. If any one passed her she did not know it, so low had she bent her shrouded head.

Zundorf was a small man, with a crown bald as an apple and a stubble of tawny beard. He looked sneeringly at Sue from behind a pair of indigo glasses that did not let you see what color his eyes were, though in reality they had little reddish circles, like a rat's.

No, he wouldn't make up any prescription without pay. This would cost a dollar, and he must see the dollar before he began on it. Dying child? Oh, yes. Too bad. But he had his living to make. It wasn't any good coaxing. He couldn't trade on promises; he'd been fooled so many times before that he'd shut down on all that kind of business now and forever.

Sue saw there was no use. She caught the prescription from off the counter, thrust it into the bosom of her dress, and sped back again to her rooms.

"Luke! You're home! Oh, Luke, I'm so glad! I was afraid—"

Then she drew back. He stood beside the bed where Willie lay. His right hand was raised, as if playfully, over the child. Her side-view of his face made her believe, at first, that only a loving smile lighted it. Then the ridges of rime on his coat, and a certain rearward totter that he gave, stung her with doubt. As he turned full upon her, she saw the leer, the sluggish flush, the bloodshot eyes—all was plain, then.

But she thought only of the child.

"Luke, tell me, tell me: Have you brought any money? Willie's sick; he awful sick. It's croup again." She shrilled more words into his face as he stood unsteadily swaying before her.

"Money, Sue?" he mumbled. Then, though incoherently, he spoke some words whose meaning she gathered. He had brought home the ten dollars, all but a dollar or so. Certain acquaintances had led him off. He had taken only three or four drinks, but she knew how he never could stand anything as could most other men, and how his long sober term had made it harder still.

She believed him; she knew he was telling her the truth. They had talked it all over so often, and she had scolded him and he had howled it meekly, for withal he loved her as dearly as she loved him, and he hated his vice with all the force of her own hatred.

He stretched out his arms to her, and though she had many times recoiled from his tenderness when this curse was upon him, she let him gather her for an instant in his arms.

"Oh, Luke," she pleaded, "give me the money! Where is it. I want it for Willie—I . . ."

But he dropped inertly on his knees before her, and then fell at full length on the floor beside the bed.

She flung herself, the next instant, across the mattress, and felt Willie's forehead, face, shoulders, chest with eager hands. He was quieter. It might mean coming death, but still he was quieter. Suddenly a shiver passed through the little frame. It stiffened in her arms, then relaxed again. The boy's breathing had the sound of air pumped into tiny resistant pipes.

"A convulsion," flashed through her thoughts. "He may have had one before, while I was away." She snatched a kiss from the boy's clammy forehead; then she rose and bent above her prostrate husband.

"Luke! Luke!" she moaned. "Where is the money? I can get the prescription with it if you'll only give it to me. There's time yet! Luke! Luke!"

While speaking she searched his pockets. She knew them all so well! She had sewed rents and darned holes in every garment he wore. Pockets of waistcoat, pockets of trousers, pockets of inside coat, pockets of drenched and icy overcoat—she searched them all. Not a sign of money—not a bill, not a dime, not a cent!

"Luke! Luke!" she kept crying. "Wake up! Wake up, for God's sake! If I could only get the money you said you've brought!"

Thick, guttural, drunken snores kept answering her. Again and again she searched. Mixed with Luke's snores came that pathetic, half-strangled wheeze from the bed.

"I—I can't find it!" she gasped to herself, standing upright. "He's lied to me." . . . Then, even at this hour, a pang of self-reproach pierced her faithful breast.

"No, no, no! He never yet lied to me! He did bring it home—all but a dollar or so, just as he said."

Perhaps the sharp, whipping sound of the bitter sleet against the windows of the next room gave her a certain new idea. She ran to one of these windows and tried with both upward-straining hands to open it. At first she failed, so tight was the sash frozen to the sill. Then, with a great, new strain, she made an aperture large enough for her to stretch both hands through it and scoop from the outer ledge a quantity of glistening sleet. With this she hurried to Luke. She pressed it upon his face and temples; she held it to his brow until she grew frightened and brushed it away on the wretched rag of a carpet that scarcely covered the bed-room floor.

"Sue!"

He lifted himself on one elbow. He stared full at her in the fallow lamplight. His look was sane and unwavering now, though still bloodshot.

"Luke! Thank God, you're yourself again! I want the money—some money—any money! You said you'd brought some home. I want it for Willie. The druggist at the corner." . . . And so, in a pell-mell torrent the words were poured from her trembling lips.

Luke got up on his feet before she had finished. He reeled a little at first and put one hand to his ice-cold head.

"The—the money? I—I gave it to the boy, Sue. At least, I guess I did. It seems to me that I did. I came in, and you wasn't here. I—I looked down at the bed, and I seen him. I didn't know he was sick. Praps I was too drunk to sec it. I—I guess I'd made it all up into a kind of little wad, and I held it over him, thinkin' he'd catch it, as he does a cake, or a nut, or anything I bring him. I guess he did catch it, too. I thought you'd come, in a minute, and I'd tell you he had it there, in his little fist. . . . Sue! Sue! What's the matter? What are ye bendin' over him for, like that?"

She had gone round to the other side of the bed. In one tight-clinched hand Willie indeed clutched a "kind of tight little wad"—bills, with some silver coins enfolded by them. This was the money that might have saved him if it had come in time. But all the wealth of all the world could not save him now.

Week.*

As an academic lecturer Professor Seeley has been successful at Cambridge. His lectures are full of ideas; they are suggestive, and, if not very eloquent, yet they are clear and attractive. But, to our mind, their chief interest lies in the fact that they deal with so many modern problems, and they place practical issues before us in a manner that cannot fail to command attention. It would be impossible for us in this brief review to follow these lectures in detail, and, as we must select two or three statements to dwell on, we first challenge what Professor Seeley says about "Greater Britain," that vast empire which, with the motherland, is now attracting so much of the world's attention. Dealing with this subject, then, Professor Seeley says that "Greater Britain is only the considerable survivor of a family of great empires which arose out of the contact of the Western States of Europe with the new world, so suddenly laid open by Vasco de Gama and Columbus. What England did was done by Spain, Portugal, France, and Holland. There was once a 'Greater Spain,' a 'Greater Portugal,' a 'Greater France,' and a 'Greater Holland,' as well as a 'Greater Britain'; but, from various causes, these four empires perished, or have become insignificant." Now, let us see how the "Greater Britain" of to-day compares in population with the "Greater Empires" of other lands. It is true "Greater France" passed away when Canada ceased to be a French dependency, and that "Greater Holland" passed away at the close of the Napoleonic wars, but it must not be forgotten that France has still a colonial population of thirty-two millions, and that she "protects" fourteen millions more; that the Netherlands has a colonial population of thirty-two millions, including her great possession of Java, with its incalculable wealth; that Spain has still a colonial population of nine millions in America, Asia, and Africa, while "Greater Britain" has only twenty millions of colonial subjects on whom she can depend, for the 300,000,000 in India are not to be trusted for a day. In acres, it is true that "Greater Britain" surpasses all others in her colonial possessions, but that is owing to the vastness of Canada and Australia, the greater parts of which are uninhabitable wastes; but, in population, France and the Netherlands have larger colonial populations than England at the present hour. Why, then, should Professor Seeley say that "there was once a 'Greater France,' a 'Greater Holland,' a 'Greater Spain,' and a 'Greater Portugal,' as well as a 'Greater Britain,'" but, from various causes, these four empires either perished, or have become insignificant." It is true that the homogenous character of the colonial possessions of England give her some advantage, but this fact does not justify Professor Seeley in saying that the colonial empire of France has "passed away or become insignificant," when we know that the trade of France with her colonies amounted to 600,000,000 francs, according to the latest returns. Even Portugal, to which he refers, has still a colonial population of more than five millions, and this is one-fourth the population of England's colonial population, for it must not be forgotten that India is not a colony, is not treated as a colony, and cannot be trusted to sustain England in her hour of trial.

Then there is another question, in treating which Professor Seeley is mistaken, and that is where he refers to the rebellion of 1837 in Canada. Here he appears to think that the rebellion was confined to the French Canadians in the Province of Quebec, and that it was an affair of races. In this he is entirely wrong. Upper Canada, as it was then called, or Ontario, as it is called to-day, was in rebellion as well as Quebec, and the rebellion was not a question of races at all. This fact is well known to every student of Canadian history.

As for India, Professor Seeley admits that that country may be separated from the British Empire any day. The danger, he says, lies in the fact that the populations of India have no memories, and that the benefits conferred by British rule in Hindostan are all forgotten by the natives. Perhaps so, because favors conferred are soon forgotten in all lands. That English rule over India has been beneficial to civilization is undoubtedly true, but Professor Seeley need not tell men who have been in India that the Sepoys have no memories, or that the blowing from the guns is not treasured in their hate. The only hope of keeping India is by pursuing the imperial policy of divide and conquer, and that England has done, and is doing, successfully, in every part of the world where such a policy is necessary for the preservation of her possessions. On the whole, while Professor Seeley has become successful as an academic lecturer, he is by no means faultless, and not always accurate.

*Professor Seeley, of Cambridge, His Lectures.

"Echoes of Battle," by Bushrod Washington James. Published by Henry T. Coates & Co., Philadelphia. A publisher's notice accompanies this book, and we are told that "This volume is one that will interest every American. It should find its way into every patriotic home in this country, whose first steps towards Independence, and last blows for Union, are so graphically referred to in its pages." The publishers must excuse us, but we differ with their estimate of the book in toto. The stories are old, threadbare, and are already known in every American household in the land, that is in every household worthy of the name of American, and, besides, there is nothing "graphic" about them, while "the beautiful language of the corresponding poems depicts with pathetic effectiveness some of the scenes," as the publishers say, exists only in the imagination of those who want a profit from the sale of the book. In plain words, the prose is weary, and the "poetry" rubbish, and after reading the book, we are forced to believe that it has been published at the author's expense, and any nincompoop can become an author on those conditions.

Gunton's Magazine commends itself to the class of people who do not believe in jingoism, and who think it possible to be well-bred and wealthy, and be good Americans at the same time. The tone of the magazine is as respectful to honest toil as any labor organ in the land, but it does not think it necessary to brand every man who acts the gentleman as "a snob," because he has learned the lesson that culture is not antagonistic to the manly virtues. We wish Gunton's Magazine success, and we want to see more like it.

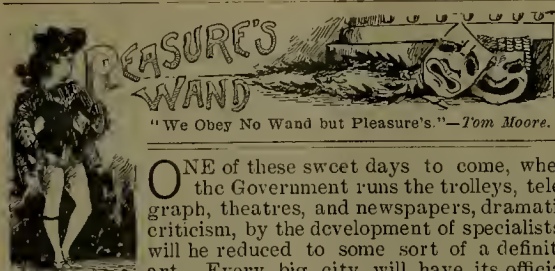

"Life at Shut-in Valley; and other Pacific Coast Tales," by Clara Spaulding Brown. This book is a collection of short stories, plainly written, but evincing a keen knowledge of human nature. There is no depth of plot and no strong character drawing, but there are "plain unvarnished tales" which are written with a freedom from aiming after effect, which is commendable. It is a book for boys and girls, rather than for mature men or women. But the reading is healthy and pure for any one.

"Other Worlds Than Ours" might as well have been named "An Old Story Retold." There is not a new idea in the book from the beginning to the end. We have been told all the book contains over and over again. Of course "matter is the common property of the Universe," but what was the use of writing a volume to tell us so, for every school-boy has been taught that lesson nowadays. The book is, however, very interesting, but—only to those who do not know the rudiments of popular astronomy.

The Appletons promise us a series of new stories about our West. They are to include "The Trapper," "The Explorer," "The Miner," "The Cowboy," "The Soldier," "The Railroad," etc. If they come up to the promises made for them in advance, they will be worth reading, but—we shall see.

"Trusts or Industrial Combinations in the United States" is the name of a remarkable book by a German, Ernest Von Halle. It looks to us, however, as if it were little more than a translation of Verein's great work on "Industrial Combinations in All Countries."

Browning's complete works, in a single volume, are now ready.

ONE of these sweet days to come, when the Government runs the trolleys, telegraph, theatres, and newspapers, dramatic criticism, by the development of specialists, will be reduced to some sort of a definite art. Every big city will have its official journal, among the staff of which will be a corps of men, each of whom has been appointed for the accuracy of his prophesies for certain things theatrical. There will be a reviewer of grand opera, another for comic opera, an analyst of farce-comedy, a thumper of problem plays, a scholarly guide to the tragic muse, an inspector of melodrama, and a scrutator of burlesques and ballets. The judgment and integrity of these gentlemen will be above impeachment, and a set of signals, such as are used by the weather bureau, may be floated from the dizzy heights of the official newspaper building for the guidance of the people. There will be the frost flag for such creations as The Daughters of Eve; an inflammatory, tobacco-tinted rag will chronicle the advent of a shapely ballet; a fog signal will announce the hopeless depths of mysticism and symbolism; the strength of operas may be gauged by wind signals, and so on, from the works of Wagner to De Koven, from Ihsen to Hoyt, may the populace be enlightened as to the character of the feasts that are before them. No longer will the hay, grain and cow editor be torn from his tranquil desk at night to "double" as the discussor of a study in sexual relaxations; nor will the dark-hrowed student of Shakespeare have to dilate on the chaste kicks and splits of Dolly Doemup of the variety.

Melodrama, for one thing, is treated with too much flippancy nowadays. If you doubt the simple trustfulness that underlies your world-caloused nature; if your heart would sink and swell at the perils that assail and the bravery that immortalizes the heroine and the hero; if your spine would telegraph shivery messages from base to apex at the villain's murderous glare; if your feet would pulsate to the wondrous rhythm and your eyes hulse at the grotesque grace of movement of the pickaninny dances; if you would sniff the aroma of blue grass and thoroughbreds, weep a little and laugh a great deal at an old-fashioned melodrama well told and acted, why, go to the California and see In Old Kentucky. You will find dynamite bombs, howie knives, revolvers, rifles, and a gulch a hundred feet deep—in fact, all the deadly paraphernalia of melodrama except the side trouser pockets, cigarettes, and mortgages. You may miss the latter, and feel like saying with May Irwin: "No mortgage! You po' thing, how lonesome you must be!" But a hundred feet of chasm will deepen a plot enough for the most exacting, and how long would a mortgage ride the homestead with a giant powder cartridge the size of a Frankfurter under it booming skyward?

In all seriousness, In Old Kentucky is a rattling good piece; in truth, one of the best of its kind that has ever visited us. Under the rapid whirl of incident and excitement there is a sure unity of construction, and though each sequence is caudily obvious, and accurate to one's ordinary anticipation of climax and finale, there is a novel unstrained effectiveness in the working out of the story and a really artistic attention to the details of local color. The race episode is better managed, by far, than that of The Jilt; and the antics, songs, dances, and band-playing of the pickaninnies are so free and natural as to suggest a holiday romp for the jolly little colored folk rather than a stage performance.

Laura Burt has made her Madge Brierly as distinct a creation as was Ada Lewis's tough girl. Her dialect is smooth and natural; she never poses, and the one little song she sings is done with consummate cleverness. Col. Saudusky Doolittle is a good specimen of Southern humor and chivalry as H. B. Bradley plays him, and Frank Lay-son is straightforward and convincing in Ralph Stuart's hauds. Paul Scott's ultra-villainous Horace Holton is augmented by Svengali whiskers that seem to overshadow even his darkest crime. The company is a large one, and for the most part, happily chosen.

More by the popularity of the Frawley Company than through any particular merit in the play, has The Ensign drawn large houses nightly to the Columbia this week. Mr. Howarth's piece is a naval melodrama with a poorly developed plot, an abundance of vigorous action, and several good scenic effects. It ends with a hanging—the hanging of melodrama where the hero is rescued just as the noose is tightening about his neck, and the poor old mother and the despairing fiancée gather around the festivities in the most approved etiquette of stage executions. Mr. Frawley plays Ensign Baird—the part that so surprisingly distinguished him last season from the Mr. Frawley hibernating in a dress suit—with even added zeal and expedition. It is like the awakening of the lion. Mr. Arbuckle draws a strong piece of character as Cockson Dudley, and Mr. Leslie's midshipman is hoyish and natural. Wilson Enos, as President Lincoln, has a role admirable for its make-up and profound thoughtfulness. Miss Bates and Miss Ross do their usual clever renderings of the heroine and ingenue. The remainder of the long cast is well sustained.

The concert given by Otto Bendix on Wednesday evening at Beethoven Hall, was well attended, in the face of a sudden and unexpected storm. The Tschaiikowsky trio for piano, violin and cello was the opening number, played by Messrs. Bendix, Landsberger, and Von der Mehden in rather a scattering fashion. Mr. Bendix is a wonderful pianist, about the best we have in San Francisco to-day, but he has not the art of sinking his identity in the ensemble when playing chamber music. The trio smacked too much of soloism to portray any unity of interpretation. Mr. Landsberger played Nardini's souata, a scholarly old composition, with its beautifully pathetic Larghetto, and Allegro bristling with complex double stops. It was agreeably rendered, but did not have the fervid breadth and flights of temperament that distinguish Mr. Landsberger's work when he is at his best. Mr. Bendix was happiest in the Chopin numbers,—though Grieg's Holberg suite was exquisitely done—the B minor Scherzo and the nocturne in D flat were the events of the evening.

Though there are many new and interesting features on the Orpheum's programme of this week, Miss Rachel Walker, the "Creole Nightingale," is the stellar attraction. She sings such familiar old songs as "The Maid of Dundee" and "The Last Rose of Summer" in a clear, pure-toned soprano, so telling and sweet as to make the most enthusiastic devotee of the variety welcome the innovation of ballads sung with unostentatious art and good method. The sisters De Van do a hair-raising balancing act, and the De Witt sisters perform some clever musical specialties. It is a capital programme all through.

It has been a week of melodrama; cold chills and uplifted hair, alternating with peals of laughter, has been the order at the Alcazar, where The Wolves of New York, in all its horror and mirth, has had a glowing presentation. For next week Mr. Grover announces A Canting Scoundrel; or, Wearing the Livery of Heaven to Serve the Devil, a comedy of San Francisco life, said to forcibly echo recent clerical lapses from grace.

The Man Without a Country adds another link to the long chain of melodramatic successes at the Grand. On Monday night a comedy-drama by Chas. T. Vincent and Louis Aldrich, will present Mr. Morosco's players in a lighter vein, though there is enough exciting incident in the piece to satisfy the most ardent admirer of the blood-and-thunderous.

After tremendous successes at the St. Louis, Dallas, and Atlanta Expositions, John Philip Sousa and his peerless band have begun their grand tour to the Pacific Coast.

The Tavery Company's grand opera season commences at the Baldwin on Monday night, February 3rd. This organization presents a very strong repertoire. For the first week the arrangement is as follows: Monday, Aida; Tuesday, Carman; Wednesday matinee, Bohemian Girl; Wednesday night, The Huguenots; Thursday, Meirom; Friday, Carallera Rustiana and I Pagliacci; Saturday matinee, Marta; and Saturday night, Lohengrin. The company embraces among its artists this season Mme. Tavery, Mme. Lichter, Sophia Romani, Theo. Dorre, Nellie Franklyn, Bella Tomlins, A. L. Guille, Wm. Stephens, Payne Clarke, Max Eugene, H. S. Dudley, Wm. Schuster, A. Abramhoff, Joseph Witt, etc.

Next week will be the last of the Frawley Company's engagement at the Columbia, and De Mille and Belasco's pronounced success, Men and Women, is to be the farewell play. It is the story of a young bank cashier gone wrong, full of strong situations, and will necessitate twenty people for the cast. Men and Women is an intensely interesting play, and in the hands of the Frawley players should prove a great attraction.

The programme of Paderewski's opening recital at the California will be announced in a few days. The initial concert takes place on the evening of February 10th, followed by matinees on the 12th and 14th. Sherman, Clay & Co. open the sale of boxes and seats on Thursday, February 6th. Paderewski is, beyond a doubt, the greatest pianist of to-day, and his coming will cause a revival in music circles.

Irion dies hard in the public's esteem; its brilliant spectacles and specialties are to be continued for another week—positively the last—after which The Gentle Savage, a new American opera by the late E. J. Darling. The book was written by Estelle Clayton and Nym Crinkle, the well-known dramatic critic.

In Old Kentucky will commence the second and last week of a highly successful engagement at the California on Monday night. Hendrick Hudson, Jr., an extravaganza said to be very picturesque and amusing, follows, presented by the Kimball Opera Comique Company, headed by Corinne, the famous dancer and singer.

The new series of Carr-Beel Saturday pop concerts will begin on the afternoon of February 8th, at Golden Gate Hall. This will make the fifth year of these invaluable music readings, that have done so much to educate San Francisco to an intelligent understanding of the beauties of chamber music. The programme for the first concert includes Mozart's exquisitely melodious quintette for clarinet and strings, Godard's trio for piano and strings, and the first performance here of Niel Gade's "Fantasie Stuke" for clarinet and piano.

The Young Ladies' Orchestra, an organization that has done noble work for the charities of San Francisco and Oakland, is in need of a fund to insure its permanence, so a concert will be given at Metropolitan Hall on the evening of February 7th to further that end.

Mr. Daniel Frohman is the first to use the phonograph to assist in the rehearsal of a play. He intends to produce Mr. H. A. Jones's new play, Michael and his Lost Angel, at New York, the same night that it is played for the first time at the Lyceum, and Mr. Jones has spoken the whole play into the phonograph. He is said to have used eight phonographic cylinders, which are now on their way to New York. When they reach America the manager will hear Mr. Jones's interpretation of his play, and this will be used as a guide at rehearsals.

"Freund's Musical Weekly" has changed its title to "The Musical Age." It will, as formerly, be conducted by Harry Freund, and the new title and dress will be accompanied by many happy changes and enlargements.

THE NEW CLIFF HOUSE

FOR forty years the Cliff House has been as famous the world over as the Yosemite Valley or Niagara Falls. Famous visitors at home and abroad have spent happy hours there watching the sea-lions and seals.

Several years ago the historic Cliff House of old California was accidentally consumed by fire, and the traditions associated about its ruins caused many a heart-pang among the old Californians. But Phoenix-like, a grander structure has arisen to console our city for the loss.

The entire conception has been that of a genius. The new Cliff House rears its head, surrounded by dazzling minarets hundreds of feet above the raging sea—a sea that is never at rest. With the advantage of the most magnificent ocean spectacle of rocks, reefs, mountains, and ragged cliffs that has ever been known, all the luxuries of modern art have been lavished upon its interior. From the two great kitchens, with their host of cooks, to the splendid banquet hall, the ornate ball room, with its dainty dressing rooms and pretty café. When the thousands of visitors begin to flock to the new Cliff House, they will have just at hand the noble Suto Baths, the like of which has never been known among either ancients or moderns for magnificence and ingenuity of mechanical engineering. The sea waves dash day and night over the rocks that form its stately bulwarks, and cast themselves into a small rock-bottomed lake which is used for a "settling pond." Thence the freshest and purest ocean water constantly flows into the vast swimming tanks within the huge building.

Added to this, the enterprise displayed by Mr. Suto in constructing an electric railway last year, which conveys passengers straight from Central avenue to the baths and Cliff House, serves to doubly enhance the public value of the three splendid resorts which he has provided to San Francisco and to the entire visiting world. The grand depot which will serve as the terminus of the railway is right at the entrance of the baths, and in itself is one of the picturesque effects of the entire spectacle. This magnificent and unparalleled Trilogy of edifices devoted to the public service—the baths, with their awe-inspiring vestibule; the magic grace of the Cliff House, and the fair, romantic park on the Heights—all these form the best evidence of Mr. Suto's real patriotism. Messrs. Wilkins and Pearson—for the latter gentleman had left Stockton to become Mr. Wilkins' associate—are fitting hosts of this castle by the sea.

The New Building.

The New Cliff House is a marvel of beauty, and architecturally is so adapted to the fierce, rocky eminence on which it stands, that imagination runs riot over its artistic radiance, its lofty sight and graceful structure, when viewed from the deck of a vessel approaching our Golden Gate. One of the best known men on the Pacific Coast is "Mine Host" Wilkins, and he is remembered from London and New York to Yokohama and Sydney by the best people in any of those cities for his careful and luxurious hospitality. His partner, Mr. Pearson, is a gentleman of wide experience. In refitting the new Cliff House all the best talent in San Francisco has been called to the front. A brief review of the various firms taking part in the mechanical and artistic achievements of this Palace by the Sea will be of interest:

Building a Palace. When a sculptor has designed a wonderful conception in plaster, he turns it over to the most skilled artificers in marble, in order that his ideal may be a complete realization of the original. And so in the erection of the beautiful new Cliff House, our latest California wonder, Messrs. Campbell & Pettus, the contractors and builders, at 40 New Montgomery street, had complete charge of the realization of the architect's original designs. To produce a building of such grace and elegance, and yet at the same time secure its complete stability on the edge of a sheer, rugged cliff has been no slight task, and the thousand and one details involved in achieving such a perfect success have demanded the most unremitting attention. However, the result is a lasting tribute to the energy of Messrs. Campbell & Pettus, and doubly so to their mechanical knowledge.

Artistic Wood-Work. For nearly thirty years the Excelsior Milling Company, whose place of business is at 713-717 Bryant St., near Fifth—the firm consisting of Messrs. David Dodge and Edgar L. Dunshee, has been first in the field for not only general milling work but for the execution, artistic effects, and designs in public buildings, and in private residences. There is hardly a wealthy mansion in San Francisco or Oakland which does not bear the impress of the firm in the way of richly moulded wood-work and interior and exterior decorations in wood, such as one finds in picturesque Europe. Hundreds of examples of their work might be pointed out, but at the moment, none better than their success at the New Cliff House could be named. All the milling work, including the doors, sashes and mouldings were constructed by the Excelsior Milling Company, and remains in itself a tribute to their thorough, substantial, and honest attention to everything which they undertake.

Staunch Timbers. Undoubtedly the most important feature in the construction of the New Cliff House has been the splendid, sound, well seasoned timber which the well-known firm, the Taylor Lumber Company of West Berkeley, has furnished. It has given to the beautiful building on the rocky cliffs a solidity which will withstand the fiercest attacks of our winter storms. Their San Francisco office is in the Luning Building, at Market and Drumm streets.

Aiding the Vista. The diamond-like transparency of the best modern plate-glass, together with non-frangible qualities, is especially to be remarked in the beautiful windows which Messrs. F. N. Woods & Co. have supplied to the new Cliff House. They are so clear that one would think them of pure crystal. This firm has also fitted up the new Parrott Building and many leading houses here.

Artistic Designs in Hardware. One of the best-known firms in San Francisco is the large establishment of the Palace Hardware Company, No. 603 Market street. They have in its way the most varied and extensive stock west of the Mississippi. No better illustration of this can be had than the complete hardware outfit which they have just supplied to the new Cliff House. The builders' hardware used in the Parrott Building and other large edifices were also furnished by this firm.

Perfection of Plumbing. Modern sanitary plumbing has been reduced to an exact science, but, as in other crafts, one cannot always find the plumber who is master of his art. However, in G. C. Sweeney, of 114 1/2 Ellis street, the San Francisco public has recognized a genius. He is the successful conqueror of malaria. To appreciate his careful, artistic work, one should see the interior of the new Cliff House, to which he supplied all sanitary plumbing, gas-fitting, lavatories, etc.

Cold Storage Room. The "cold storage room" is becoming as much in favor in San Francisco as it is in New York, since the well-known firm of Baeder & Fincke introduced its manufacture in San Francisco. For bar, store, and office fittings this firm is celebrated, and also for their bowling alleys. This firm is at 508 Fifth street, near Bryant.

Luxurious Bar Fittings. The civilization so thoroughly manifested in our Eastern cities is rapidly repeating itself here, through the efforts of Schuster Brothers, of 306 Sutter street, in the matter of luxurious bar fittings. Everything that the most elaborate café in

New York possesses has been supplied to the Cliff House by this well-known firm—the counter-sunk work, the air pumps in the lower bar, the marble-work about the superb beer-pump, with its beautiful silver faucets—in short, the achievement is an artistic surprise.

For the Cordon Bleu. It is doubtful if in the world over one could find more thoroughly appointed kitchens than Messrs. John G. Iis & Co., of 814 Kearny street, have prepared for the Cliff House. In the matter of ranges and all the accoutrements which appertain to the most modern requirements, the Cliff House kitchens are unequalled on this coast. It is completely satisfactory to the cordon bleu chef who will preside over it.

Its Palatial Furnishings. The fairy-like interior of the new Cliff House has been produced by Messrs. J. Fredericks & Co., of 649 Market street. The rich carpets, the superb furniture, the rich curtains and portiers—indeed, all the magnificent upholstery which this firm has used in the decoration of this establishment have made it a palace.

The Lighting Elevator. The elevator at the new Cliff House was installed by W. L. Holman, of 230 Fremont street, and the Electrical Engineering Co., of 34-36 Main street; the former furnished the car, cables, and all the guiding apparatus, besides furnishing and building the cars for Sutro's Electric Railway, while the latter designed and built the winding machinery, and all the electrical controlling apparatus. The machine is of the worm-wheel type, the four car and two counter-weight cables being wound upon a spirally grooved drum. The motor is of the multi-polar type, wound to suit the 500 volt circuit from the Sutro Electric Railway line. All high speed bearings are self-oiling, and the worms run in an oil bath. Attention is thus reduced to a minimum, and any one can take care of the mechanical parts. The car is grill work of neat design, and is very light and strong. The cables are of special manufacture, strong, pliable, and durable. All the movements are easily and quickly indicated by means of a lever in the car, which is the approved plan for such service. The control is obtained by a small current carried to the car through a thoroughly insulated flexible cable, from which there is not the slightest danger of obtaining a shock. The controlling mechanism is placed in the basement with the driving machinery, and the indications carried to it by the small current. Its speed is 300 feet per minute. Safety appliances are provided at all points, and the machinery is instantly stopped in case the current is interrupted from any cause. In all it is an engineering triumph for the Electrical Engineering Company and W. L. Holman.

Stopping the Leaks. The pioneer advocate of the cash register system in California was John J. Wilkins of the new Cliff House. He was first to place a machine in his establishment years ago, when they were a complete novelty. With his proverbial sagacity he realized, as he says, that they "stopped all leaks—accidental or otherwise!" But as time goes by, there has been a wonderful improvement in the mechanism of these registers, and at last perfection has been reached in the National Cash Registers, of which Messrs. Pierce & Co., at Room 12, Chronicle Building, are agents. Messrs. Wilkins and Pearson have adopted them for their grand enterprise at the Cliff. This invention has revolutionized the entire system, both for simplicity, surety, and artistic elegance.

The Camera Obscura. Berlin, Paris, London, and other great European capitals possess that beautiful scientific phenomenon, the camera obscura, and now San Francisco is about to have hers. In the tower of the new Cliff House one will be able to view the splendid panorama of coast and shore through the medium of this ingenious apparatus. Mr. L. A. Berteling, the well-known scientific optician of 427 Kearny street, was the only man in the United States able to design and carry out its elaborate construction.

Sweet Music. In the luxurious suites of the New Cliff House may be found the favorite, rich toned Sohmer pianos—which have the "singing" tone Liszt used to speak of. A dozen of them were furnished by their popular representative on the Pacific Coast, Byron Mauzy, 308-314 Post street.

Pabst Beer Exclusively. The famous Pabst Milwaukee beer exclusively on draught and in bottles is sold at the Cliff House, which adds considerably to the attractions of this unique resort. The Pabst Brewing Co., of Milwaukee, Wis., is the largest establishment of its klud in the world. The beer of this great concern has always gained the highest honors at all expositions. Only last year it succeeded in winning the first award against all competitors in Munich, Germany, the former greatest lager beer brewing city of the world. The Pabst Brewing Co. turns out over a million barrels of beer every year, which is three hundred thousand barrels more than the next largest brewery in the United States. This certainly attests the popularity of this beer. The Pabst

Brewing Co. stands to-day at the head of all the breweries, and this position has been achieved solely through merit. The high-spirited courage of the Pabst Brewing Co. in venturing upon one of the most ambitious schemes of the century deserves of the highest credit, and is a sufficient guarantee that the high standard of their beer will be maintained for all time to come. They were bound to have the best materials to produce the best beer, and they invested an enormous fortune to establish their world-wide reputation. The Royal Eagle Distilleries Co., the general agents of the Pabst Brewing Co., have done their share to establish a constantly increasing demand for this famous beer in the city and vicinity. This well-known concern imported during the last year as much Pabst Milwaukee beer in bulk into San Francisco as was imported from all the other Eastern breweries combined, and it is safe to say that in the hands of the Royal Eagle Distilleries Co. the demand for the famous Pabst beer will continually increase.

Choice Brands of Cigars. It was lucky for William Lewis & Co., of 24 and 26 California street, that they secured so much good Havana tobacco before the recent Rebellion. Nowadays, with a fine stock of the "Porto del Oro," the "Adolph Sutro," and the "Purity Club," on hand, they are confident of the public verdict that they have the finest stock on the coast. These popular brands will always be kept on hand at the new Cliff House.

The New Stables. A feature of the new Cliff House is the splendid and completely appointed stables and sheds, which have been built on the bluff to the north of the building and easy of access to it. The management takes great pride in this important innovation, and well they may. The floor of this stable is a very fine and excellent piece of work, laid in a manner new to this section, but common in the East. It is of Watson's asphalt mastic, and was done by the Pacific Refining and Roofing Company, of which Mr. W. J. Watson is manager. This company, whose office is at No. 153 Crocker Building, have extensive works at the Potrero, where they handle the entire coal tar product of the two gas companies here and that of many adjacent cities, and also refine asphalt, and make building and roofing papers and roofing materials. They also do gravel roofing, a recent piece of their work having been the great court in the center of the Parrott building, which work during its progress was inspected by many of the architects and builders of the city, and elicited very favorable comment.

THE craze of the period is certainly novelty. Hosts and hostesses are racking their imaginations for an original idea wherewith to entertain society. The peasant dance dinner-to-night at the Tobins' is one of those which has taken practical shape; apropos of which a girl at recent University Club lunch was heard to say: "It's pretty good of the Tobin-Jarboe crowd to adopt the peasant costume notion when everybody knows it was one of them who raised such a fuss over peasant dress for the leap year cotillion. However, people needn't mind short dresses at a dinner table, don't you know, the feet are not shown."

The publication of the coats of arms borne by our people of aristocratic tendencies in a Sunday paper is amusing, if not instructive. The fact that a clan bearing the name of one lady's maiden patronymic exists in Scotland and thereby entitles her to adopt their crest, is good. So, too, the dove flying forth being emblematic of the migratory strain in another family. Then we are told that no less than two armorial bearings ornament a swagger residence in the Western Addition, though people conversant with the ancestry of its owner declare the ducal coronet is a puzzle, unless a motto can be used that "everything can be got for money." No wonder one of our first families changed the d in the original name to b, for who would wish to pose as coming from Essex as a bad male bird?

The girls are in a state of the most pleasurable excitement over the coming domino and mask party at the Presidio, for as the men are to be simply in evening dress the pretty creatures will be enabled to intrigue them, as the French say, to any extent. The men may expect to have a perfect shower of rallery, all sorts of questions asked, and no doubt many confessions made under shelter of the mask; for ever since Juliet told Romeo of her love when the "mask of night" was on her face, that article has been found a handy thing to cover the confusion of such avowals. Lovely costumes are being discussed, and should the night be propitious a most enjoyable time is anticipated.

The recently announced matrimonial engagements of members of our best society will carry much consolation to those of our charming maidens of the swim who have been prominent figures therein for season after season without any of Cupid's darts having struck home for good and all. For it will be seen in each instance that the bride elect is one of that body herself; so the present sweet end of the season can go on rejoicing for many a winter yet; there are lots of good times ahead ere sober matrimony calls a halt.

If that knowing old party, Dame Rumor, speaks by the card our social world is likely to have a real sensation ere long in the culmination—by a divorce suit—of what has been for some time called "domestic unpleasantness" in the affairs of a couple each of whom is very popular in the swim. No names are given, because every one on the inside will know who is meant, and to outsiders the matter is of no moment.

They say the Brownies are in a state of exasperation this winter, and all because some of the erstwhile old club chaps have come out as dancers, and the girls prefer the oldsters every time.

"What a jolly good time Mrs. Millie Ashe-Sewell is having in her visit to her old home," is a remark heard on all sides.

The writer of the anonymous paragraph for "Sparks" evidently undervalues the department. However, we never return stamps, good cigars, or their equivalent.

There is a murmur going round that the next "novelty" dance will be given in a big house on the Avenue, and will be a "skirt dance." Those of the guests who are not adepts in this line must be contented to do the looking on act—like the dowagers at the cotillions—but the way the women are practicing the high kick would lead one to believe there will be a goodly number of dancers on the floor.

On dit, Al. Bowie and others are meditating an old bachelors' cotillion to be given either just before Lent or directly after Easter. Should the report be based on fact the affair is sure to be the climax of a most charming season.

The French conversation class is progressing so rapidly the Presidio chaps are now able to make use of the verb amour without committing themselves; while the girls have mastered tenir.

W. D. Page and Miss Sarah Collier's names are being coupled most energetically of late by society folks.

THE MAN ON THE DRY GOODS BOX

TRUTH is stranger than fiction, and, therefore, this story requires no preface. It was given to me a few days ago by a well-to-do widow in Solano County, and it will talk for itself. The lady referred to secured a promise as to secrecy regarding her name, the location of the events, and every thing which might lead to the bringing home of the story to her door. So, with these precautions taken, the tale is given in substance as she told it. She said:

I had just buried my husband. If you must know it, he shot himself out of unfounded jealousy at our home down the country. He left behind, after I had sold our furniture and belongings, and had paid the expenses of the funeral, a widow with a baby two and a half years old, and with just seven dollars in my pocket on my arrival in San Francisco. My trunk was at the depot, for I wanted to go up north to mother. But the fare was $7.05, and the railroad clerk could not take a cent less. I don't know when I had eaten last, but baby could not have had anything for twenty-four hours, and commenced to cry. How I got there I cannot tell, but I must have walked up from Fourth and Townsend to Market, and thence, trying in my poor way to devise some plan, have gone round and round the block bounded by Ellis, Market, and Stockton, till my fevered brain was raging. How long I did this I cannot tell, but it must have been for two or three hours, poor hungry baby crying and moaning in my arms incessantly. Suddenly I heard a voice by my side and saw, through the film in my eyes, a gentleman well-dressed and of prepossessing appearance. "Madam," he said, as he lifted his hat, "you seem to be in trouble. If it is in my power will you let me assist you?"

In a torrent of hurried words, half-crazed with sorrow and hunger, I told him my story.

"Let us walk," he said, "as far as the restaurant opposite. Baby must be hungry, and you, too, surely need sustenance and rest. Come!"

He took baby from my arms, and I followed blindly, and as one in a dream.

We were soon seated and served with a luxurious breakfast, baby eating bread and milk until she fell asleep.

"Now," said he, "let us go down to the depot. You said you had seven dollars. Give them to me and I will supply the odd five cents, and put you on your way to your mother's home."

I never doubted him for a moment, and gave it to him, although he might have run away with my all. He called a hack, drove to the depot, and in a few minutes had me seated comfortably on the boat, with my ticket in my purse for home.

Just as the boat was within a minute of starting he asked permission to kiss the little one, and, as we started, he squeezed something into her tiny fist, and, bending over to me, said:

"Never forget the man on the dry-goods box." Then we started.

I was stunned a few minutes afterward, when baby held out her little red hand, and said: "Mamma, see what I dot!"

I took the paper from her hand, and it was a $100 green-back.

What was the mystery? I puzzled over it for hours, and at last, in God's mercy, I understood everything.

* * * *

Some seven years before, in company with my brother, I was returning from the theatre to our rooms on Washington street. Coming along Kearny, we met a man and woman wearily plodding along the uneven sidewalk.

The man, seeing us, left the woman and said: "For the love of God, lady, give me half a dollar to get a bed and breakfast for my wife. She is starving."

I reached down to my pocket, when my brother said angrily "Leave us alone, or I'll have you arrested." We quickened our pace until we reached home, although the sad tones of the man's voice still lingered in my ears.

"You mustn't take any notice of beggars, especially at night," said my brother, as he kissed me on retiring.

But my heart was troubled, and, after undressing, I stood at my window musing.

There was a large empty dry-goods box on the opposite corner, and I had hardly been three minutes at the window, full of painful thoughts, when I saw the man and woman creeping wearily along the sidewalk. When they came to the dry-goods box, he took off his coat, and laid it inside. Then he helped the woman to crawl into it, and, saying something I could not catch, mounted the top of it, and prepared to sit there all night.

A flood of tears broke up my reverie, and, hastily dressing myself, I stole down stairs and crossed the street.

"Here, my good man," I said, offering him a half-dollar. "Take this and get a bed for yourself and your wife."

"Thank you," he said gravely, "but we are all right for to-night. I will take your half-dollar, so that we can eat to-morrow. We can rest here. No one will molest us."

In a second I pressed another half dollar into his hand, saying: "Sleep and eat too." Then I left them.

I do not often pray for people except for myself and baby, but from that night baby and I have never failed to ask God to bless the man who sat on the dry-goods box that dark, chilly night, and who afterward sent us up to Trinity County. Bread cast on the waters? See how it came back to me."

PHIL MAY, the English artist, knows more of drawing than of cricket, while Dr. W. G. Grace, the famous cricketer, knows more about the game than about anything else in the world. The latter is inclined to be critical, and when Mr. May published a picture pretending to show a cricket match he received the following telegram: "Why, oh, why does square leg wear wicket keeping gloves? W. G. Grace." At about mid-night Phil May came out into Fleet street and thought he would send an answer. So he went into the telegraph office and wrote it. The clerk, seeing the address, remarked that it was some miles from Bristol, and a special messenger would be required. "All right," said May, "send it off at once." And at about 2:30 on a bleak December morning the champion was awakened from his first sleep and dug from his bed to read the reply. "To keep his hands warm. Phil May."—Ex.

No Cause for Undue Alarm. The anxiety experienced here over the situation in which Mr. John Hays Hammond has been placed by the collapse of the recent émence in the Transvaal, will, we hope, prove in the hereafter to have been unfounded. His connection with powerful London companies makes it their duty to protect him, and the British have never yet laid themselves open to the charge of having left a friend in distress. The Boer bogey has been greatly magnified over here by a class of individuals who always seize upon an opportunity of this kind to parade themselves before the public, and the more fuss they can kick up the greater the advertisement, which has the additional advantage of being cheap. From an intimate acquaintance with Mr. Hammond, we have no hesitation in expressing the belief that the charges of overt acts and conspiracy, in which the sensation-mongers have dealt so liberally of late, in connection with the young engineer's arrest, are simply baseless fabrications. As the manager-in-chief of the vast mining interests of the South African Company, Hammond had a duty to perform, irrespective of personal considerations, and true to his character, he fulfilled it. While the Volksraad may see fit to carry their primitive measures so far as to confiscate property belonging to anyone upon whom their suspicions may dwell as unfriendly, it is safe to say that they will not go so far in that direction beyond certain bounds. As for any intemperate measures being adopted, involving the lives of Mr. Hammond or his associates, the idea is too absurd. The Boers have too much common sense for any mad action of that kind. The incident may, however, serve to stir up our Government enough to take means of some forcible character to protect its citizens from outrage in foreign lands. On top of Monroism for domestic use, we want a new doctrine established for maintaining the dignity of the flag abroad.

Comstock Mining Shares. Judge Seawell has handed down a decision in regard to the voting of proxy stock by California companies, which will set at rest a lot of caviling which has been going on for some time on the subject. The point was raised in regard to the legality of the last Con. Cal.-Virginia, which was carried on, as usual, with all other Comstock companies, incorporated here, in conformity with the requirements of the statutes, covering the elections of corporations. A stockholder claimed that voting stock by proxy was illegal, although the law says it can be done. Judge Seawell, in his decision, which sustains the company's action in every particular, has decided this point finally, and the disturbers of the peace in stock circles will now have to dig up some new issue if they intend to stay in business. A few more decisions of the kind will help the market in more ways than one, and clear the financial horizon of a cloud which has been hanging over it for some time past. The market has been quiet during the week, with very satisfactory reports from the mines, and especially from Savage and Occidental.

A Profitable California Gold Mine. The Pioneer Mining Company is now putting in some powerful air compressors, preparatory to extending its operations in the lower workings of their property. The company cleared over $6,000 last month, with its vast reserves of ore practically untouched. The stock is now quoted at between $4 and $5 per share in Boston, a comparatively low figure when the value of the mine is considered.

Back-Sand Phantasies. Very little is heard now of the black-sand operations on the ocean beach. Some little time ago a revival of the craze furnished an opportunity for the theoretical scribbler to work off considerable surplus steam, and columns of matter appeared from this source. As usual, however, the results were not in consonance with the theories.

California Miners To the Front. The Gold Mining Exchange of San Francisco held a meeting during the week to take some steps to aid John Hays Hammond and other Americans in jail at Pretoria, by urging the necessity for immediate action upon the President. The outcome was a call for a mass-meeting of citizens in the Chamber of Commerce to-day, when San Francisco will undoubtedly make a very forcible protest against any further delay in intervening some way or the other for the protection of citizens in South Africa. The prevailing opinion seems to be that when American citizens are illegally jailed abroad, it is about time to dispense with red-tape at home and get down to work without losing time in the mere diplomatic discussion of the case.

The Fireman's Fund Election. The annual election of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company took place during the week, and the following Board of Directors was re-elected to serve for the ensuing year: D. J. Staples, John O. Earl, John Barton, John H. Gardiner, John T. Wright, Thomas S. Chard, W. H. Brown, F. W. Lougee, J. C. Coleman, John Birmingham, and Wm. J. Dutton. A comparison of the condition of the company is given in the annual statement, shows the steady increase made in the company's business, from which two years are here noted as sufficient to illustrate its remarkable growth: In 1890 assets were $2,431,717.79; reinsurance reserve, $797,618.97, and net surplus, $484,438.25. In 1896 the assets had increased to $3,449,095.88; the reinsurance reserve had swelled to $1,218,571.74, and the net surplus was $987,205.09.

Stockholders Must Now Pay Up. The Supreme Court has at last decided that the stockholders in the Pacific Bank are liable individually for their respective portions of the debts and liabilities of the insolvent corporation. In about half the time they were thinking over the matter, the Glasgow Bank Directors were sentenced to penal servitude, and its stockholders had either paid up, or had been sold out by the Sheriff. The failure of that concern, too, was not nearly so disreputable as that of the Pacific. If the whole management of this bank had its just deserts, they would be in the State Prison for life, and without any exception, either, on the ground of ignorance of the rascalities being perpetrated by a set of sanctimonious hypocrites.

A Corner in Camphor. The ubiquitous, irrepressible, and never successful Colonel North, the "Nitrate King," is reaching out for a still further extension of power in the world of commerce. His latest enterprise, according to a correspondent, is the purchase of all the camphor in the universe. Enormous stores of this commodity are pouring in on him, and the wags of Europe have already dubbed him the "camphorated Colonel." He has an army of secretaries—a mine secretary, a railway secretary, and a nitrate secretary. The appointment of a camphorated secretary is now politely suggested.

The Magalia A Bonanza. The Magalia mine, formerly known as the Pushbacker, which was killed in this city by the petty jealousy which has ruined business in San Francisco, at the time Major McLaughlin brought it out at a great personal expense, is now said by the interior press to be without doubt the richest gravel mine in the State. The deposit is very rich, and now that the pay gravel has been reached, the owners will be repaid in a great measure for their expensive outlay in sinking a shaft in a short run. This was another case of casting pearls before swine.

THE Leadville, Col., Herald-Democrat, in its annual mining review, shows the value of this year's product of the Leadville mines to be $13,318,774, an increase over 1894 of $5,000,000. The net tons of ore smelted during 1895 amounted to 349,710, producing 100,499 ounces of gold, 13,530,348 ounces of silver, 62,471,670 pounds of lead, and 4,584,906 pounds of copper.

COLONEL William J. Sutherland, the prominent mining operator, is in town again after an absence of a few weeks on business connected with the large mining interests under his control in Nevada.

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

IF there is any limit to the impertinence of interviewers, or any dose of private domestic scandal too nauseating for the editors of the daily press, they have not yet become known. Every mole-hill of news is magnified to a mountain of importance, and the telegraph is strained to tell the world of tidings that in all honor and decency should never be known outside the household in which it was born. That no household is too sacred for the babbling newspaper gossip to enter, no name or position held in too great veneration to disclose to an impertinent world its inmost secrets, has now become disgracefully true to the man who has occupied the first position in the nation. Self-respect and decency are unknown to the paudors to public curiosity, and the family linen of ex-President Harrison has now begun to be washed before the whole country, and before it is all pulled over and aired and displayed, it will be more soiled than ever, and it will be wonderful if there shall be left one piece that is not spotted and smutched beyond the power of time or prayer to make clean. No man was ever great to his valet, and the ex-President, before he leads his fiancée to the altar, will see himself as others see him, weak, sinful, deformed, beyond the power of any introspection or memory to recognize. He will be made to forget that he ever had anything to be grateful to the American people for. He will see what a moral monster he is believed to be. He will find his children have become his critics and his enemies, his constituents have become his inquisitors, his name known only to infamy. Like Lear he will seek for brotherhood in the tempest, and like Job he will curse the day on which he was born. Such is the benignant power of the daily press, and such the grateful respect of the American people.

THE friends of Mr. John Hays Hammond have shown a commendable energy in trying to come to the rescue of this prisoner caught in the act of rebellion against the Government of President Kruger. We don't know anything about what Hammond has done, nor what he has been charged with, nor whether he is wrong or right. And we do not know exactly what the punishment is likely to be. But we understand that, after the ordinary methods of Governments, when a person is found guilty of encompassing the life of a Prince, or a Governor, or President, or the Government itself, that there is something with boiling oil in it. It does seem as if something ought to be done about it, and that, if it be true that nothing of the kind has happened, then nothing more ought to happen. It seems, furthermore, as if we didn't know much about matters in the Transvaal anyway, but that, as we have just slapped England in the face to make her mend her manners, we now ought, as we believe has been done, to request the English Government to interpose and save any imprudent malefactor from the power of an avenging and outraged President. When the news comes of what has occurred, we are certain that the very best will have happened, or we shall be mistaken.

SINCE the great General Boum displayed his magnificent war-like propensities in laying out his plans for the campaign, as the Grand Commander of her bouffe operatic Majesty, the Grand Duchess of Gerolstein, we have not had his equal, till the contemplated arrival of the successor of Campos on the Island of Cuha. There is now to be no more nonsense. The insurgents are now to be shot down, killed, annihilated—Bang, hang, bang. The pretended republic is to be blown to bits—Bang, hang. The power of the majesty of Spain is to be incarnated in the person of General Weyler, bang, hang, and then there will be peace. Down with Campos. Up with Weyler. Death to rebels—Bang, hang, bang.

AMID the din of scandal and hush of religious sympathizers, it is said that there has appeared an honest minister of the Gospel. Be it known, no notice would probably have been taken of his unusual virtue, but that he slopped over in his pulpit, displayed his ignorance of that of which he was most wisely discoursing, and sat down. He had laid the blame for the existence of dives and other pools of filth upon the Board of Supervisors. There was his error. The "solid eight" of that notorious body are guilty of so much that it is surprising that any man could, by ill luck, happen to hit on any single sin of which they were not guilty. But it was just the luck of the Rev. Dr. Case. So here was a chance for Vice to put on airs of Virtue. It did, and said Dr. Case had lied. Then Dr. Case went down among the lawyers, and, for once, got enlightened a little, and saw that he was wrong, and then, with a degree of decency and manliness that is conspicuous by its manifold absence, he went up into his pulpit and said he had been wrong. As it is probably the only time in the world's history when the "solid eight" have been right and Dr. Case entirely wrong, it seems to be such an occasion as calls for the setting apart by the Governor of a day for thanksgiving and prayer, and offering the sacrifice of the American bird of freedom, the turkey, and we hope the Governor will bestir himself, and issue his proclamation to that effect.

SOME day, in the happy visitation of an avenging Providence, people who have learned the alphabet will rise up as one man in every city in the land and irredeemably destroy all the printing presses and the immaculate sheets not yet stained with the drivel that is daily stamped upon them and spread over the face of the earth. If the newspapers do not outdo themselves in private scandal, they nauseate mankind with the profundity of their idiocy in reference to the probable action of great governments. The diapered babes, who in their columns slobber prophecies to entertain a credulous world, have evinced the embryotic condition of their brains in elucidating the purposes of the Government of Queen Victoria. Its fleet of warships is to cross the Atlantic to overcome the United States and knock Venezuela into smithereens. The English Government is going to buy Cuba, probably take it in exchange for Gibraltar, and so on to the end of impossibilities. It is so customary for the English or any other Government to tell childish stories of childish purposes, that babes who read such stuff may find consolation and comfort in believing it. When the millennium comes there will be great guillotines, set up everywhere, for the immediate execution of the fools who print such vapidities, and the fools who spend their time in reading them.

IF there were any bigger fools in the community than the fellows who have been granted the opportunity to utter their idiocies from the pulpit, we should not mention them half so often. But their folly is born with them, and will disappear only with themselves. These so-called teachers of morals and religion, catching the tune set by the recent scandals connected with one of their own, have dared in public to doubt the propriety of permitting themselves to be left alone in the company of women. One of them, on the pretense of being above such insinuations, helps disseminate the implied affront by proclaiming that ladies will be admitted to his studio alone. The devil himself, who occasionally helps along the cause of morality by increasing immorality, will find no nastier food for his maw than this whole gang. The man who stands in a house of God, or within its precincts, and dares to hint a helief that women are not throughout the world, and for all time, of better instincts and higher morals than the sex which continually seeks them as its victims, has not yet learned the alphabet of decency and morality, and should be kicked from the place he contaminates, out of communion with mankind, and into the place of everlasting punishment and remorse and damnation.

THE prize-fighters are very eager to get at each other, now that it is probable that the law will prevent them the brutal pleasure. Even Choynski grows brave, and threatens to ford the swollen Jordan, yet conscious that there is a rope tied to him. And Corbett boasts him as if it were not possible for him to lose the belt by which he cinched the whole world. Why not turn these human tigers into a rough-and-tumble ring, and halloo: "hlood to the hloodiest!" Only make them fight minus spectators, just for the love of fighting. Yet, since the world is so big with the threat of war, a little bout with the knuckles ought not to be so shockingly had.

THERE is a tiny old southern "Colonel"—who was a Captain in the Mexican war—also a volunteer in the Seminole war, among other South Carolina gentlemen. He is very correct, very dapper, and remembers every duel that was fought in our first half century of this era. He is a friend of Major "Ned" Palmer—the celebrated gourmet who makes terrapin stews for Jimmy Coleman, Theodore Payne and Daniel O'Connell, and eats them all up). Saturday afternoon last as the Colonel was about to take his car for the ferry, Major Palmer happening by, the two entered an ancient and time honored retreat for the purpose of discussing the characters of the Governors of North and South Carolina.

As the two paragons of old-fashioned chivalry stood at the polished mahogany bar, a well-known local sailor-boarding-house "runner" at their side asked for a whiskey straight. The barkeeper arranged two hot toddies and one straight whiskey before the three personages.

Now the Colonel is very near-sighted, and, instead of taking his own drink, he reached forward and raised the straight whiskey of the burly water-front stranger toward his lips.

In an instant, a heavy paw clutched the fragile Colonel's shoulder and a harsh voice roared out:

"Leave that drink alone, you Old Fool! That's mine! Blank you!"

The debonair relic of a former and polished age, laid down the whiskey with a Chesterfieldian bow. Then adjusting his eye-glasses, said with the sweetest smile and in his deepest Southern dialect:

"Sir, you do me honor, sir; you are a gentleman of sense and discernment, sir, and I respect your judgment. I am an 'old fool,' sir. You are perfectly right, sir. Because I am so filled with regret, sir, at the terrible misfortune, sir, which first led your parents to meet each other, sir!"

Of course the bully who did not comprehend a word of this gaudiloquence, grumbled, gulped his liquor, and left.

"If he'd have said another wurr'd, Colonel," exclaimed Tom Cunningham, —the proide u v Ireland—(who had been standing close by) "I'd have smashed him from here to Banagher!"

Tom is a great admirer of the Colonel, and he certainly would have carried out his word.

Who will not see me wave my hand,
When on the curbstone's edge I stand,
Nor stop the car at my demand?

The gripman.

Who on my shiny, satin basque,
Will, smirking, put his greasy grasp,
And set for me a two hour task cleansing the imprint of his big paw with benzine, and swearing about as much as any real lady is ever permitted to swear?

The conductor.

Colonel Dickey was real mad one day last week. The jolly veteran had not called the races right, couldn't guess a horse even for place; the cook was out of sorts, too, and everything seemed to go wrong. So, when a shabby-looking fellow, who had smuggled himself into one of the rear dining rooms, and then had ordered and eaten a three dollar meal, and washed it down with a quart of claret, told Colonel Dickey that he could not pay him, that usually urbane gentleman landed a kick between the beat's coat-tails—just where he thought it would do the most good.

The fellow made no attempt to resent the indignity, but simply remarked in a sad tone, "You will be sorry for this some day, Colonel," trudged off through the storm. And the Colonel was sorry, very sorry, and this is the way it came about:

On Tuesday afternoon a swell double team halted at the Colonel's door, and a young and fashionably dressed man flung the reins to a groom and jumped out with his friend. Colonel Dickey had a glimpse of them as they passed through the bar room. "Treat those fellows well," he enjoined the bead waiter, "they are bloods, sure." And they were well treated. They ate sumptuously and quaffed Pommery Sec with the keen relish of epicures. As they finished the dessert and topped it off with some fine brandy, the Colonel entered. At once he recognized the tramp of a few days before, and felt that he had made a mistake in chastising him.

"Ah, Colonel," said the stranger, pleasantly, as he glanced over the bill, "here you are. I knew you would be sorry," and parting his coat tails, he asked mildly, "please kick again."

Dickey was too dumbfounded to accept the invitation, and before he recovered his senses the imperturbable beat was gone. But the bill, like its predecessor, still remains unpaid.

The deacious wait—are all prepared to deal with parson Brown.

And judge if he the cross shall bear, or wear the martyr's crown;

Mysterious Mattie Overman has modestly declared

She'd tell of all those walks and drives that she and Brown have shared;

The pious Mrs. Tunnel's tongue has burst its rigid fetters,

And that good dame will not deny those very curious letters;

But Parson Brown's sad liver has shown its strong dislike

To see its master under fire, and so has gone on strike,

Most worthy deacons, put an end to those vexatious ills,

And fill your laggard parson full of anti-bilious pills.

That part of the community which pats itself on the back and calls itself the musical world, is getting ready to be startled into wonder and gabbling applause. She has just returned from Europe, where she has gratuitously surprised the musical connoisseurs of the Old World by her unparalleled register. It begins down among the low notes of the contralto, and, in its upward flight, passes the limitations of the greatest singers of the past and present. From the lofty summit of E in altissimo, which is located on the Mt. St. Elias of the staff, she twitters and trills where there are no companions to rival her, and looks down on the ambitious reaches of Patti and Nilsson, even probably holding in contempt the wonderful Eiffel-tower note of the sky-rockety Sybil—early praised everywhere, till later nowhere named. But this unsurpassable She comes from the country of the unsurpassable, our own modest, but superior California. It is Miss Ellen Beach Yaw, and it is all because of a wonderful neck, that her admirers declare to be as graceful as a swan's, and which in innocent and trustful confidence she unfolds to public gaze and never takes a reef in it. It is the nest of sweetest sounds. It is young and white and far reaching. It is full of promise and promissory notes, and we shall wait to get our share.

'Tis strange that the Eagle, with all his deft on,
Should ask, for Jack Hammond's protection, the lion;
Is St. George's white standard in those petty wars
More potent to shelter than our stars and bars?
Are we to assume that the Boer would not heed
Our appeal in behalf of our people in need?
That forsooth we must ask from one, he not our friend,
The safeguard the flag we dislike much may lend.
The fact is apparent mid blowing and thunder,
Those Washington statesmen are too prone to blunder.

Charles Josselyn, since the cares and responsibilities of his Alhambra Theatre, at Redwood City, squatted on his shoulders, has undergone a change which has given his friends some passing uneasiness. His usually frank American mode of expression has been abandoned for one, possibly more in harmony with the character of a theatrical manager, but which, it must be confessed, sounds rather odd when introduced into the ordinary affairs of life. Now, on Tuesday Mr. Josselyn when seated in his favorite nook in the Bohemian Club, was accosted by that grave philosopher and unnaturalscientist, George Nagle.

"Charley," said Mr. Nagle, the light of hospitality beaming in his mild blue eye, "have you been to luncheon yet?"

"Marry and come up, but naught of viands have passed my lips to-day," rejoined the manager, "an' forsooth, it seemeth near the hour of noon."

Mr. Nagle looked slightly astonished, but continued:

"Suppose, then, we go in, Charley."

"Grammercy, good knave, but thou striketh mine humor," replied Mr. Josselyn. "I would fain sit with thee at the board, for, God's mercy, but mine entrails craveth sustenance most mightily. Little thou knowest, George, how we who deal with sock and buskin lay awake o' nights devising things to please ye public. Mark ye, lad, 'tis no light task, by my faith, to make merry for those burghers of Redwood. Gadzooks! but the knaves are critical. They come with their good dames, and buxom daughters, and because they pay a few silver pieces, deem, forsooth, that we must tickle them in the midriff all night for the same. Thou mindest that clever limner, Jack Stanton, he that deviseth the Moorish scene for our drop curtain. Why, I am a shotten herring, if those same burghers did not swear that Stanton had taken that same cunning conceit from a nook in Sullivan's alley, the Chinese quarter, you know. Hallo, here cometh that jocose leech, Chismore, an' by my faith, he looketh as grave as if he had just plastered a broken pate."

There was no smile, indeed, on Dr. Chismore's face as his hand wandered professionally to Manager Josselyn's pulse.

"Rest," he whispered to Mr. Nagle, "complete rest from the worry of theatrical management, is all that our poor friend needs."

Regild the royal scepter, and furbish up the throne,
The regal robes fetch from the wash, the king will have his own;
No matter how the Junta raves, the cackling of geese
That once saved Rome, will not restrain the lambkins from their fleece;

Too long they've shivered in the cold, all pastureless and starved,
Quite crowded out while others grabbed political award,
But now they've massed together, and sworn by the Book,
King Christopher shall reign again, and wave his magic crook.

MRS. SOULTON—Poor dear Dr. Brown, how he must suffer, innocent as he is.

MRS. SOULTON—Indeed it is. I'm sure the hussy made all the advances.

Oakland's poet parson, on Broadway's muddy street,
Two bloomer girls met one day, and smiled upon their feet;
Why, angry gossips, why deny this gifted son of song
A peep at ankles neat and trim, why call such glances wrong?
When nature has been lavish in graceful curve and line,
Who'd bar from contemplating them, this eloquent divine?
Only some acid virgins, whose face sweet milk would curl,
Would hid the Rev. Davis shun those winsome bloomer girls.
Or would infer his innocence this passing glance might hurt,
And lead him to emhalm in verse the bifurcated skirt.

Emile Sauret, the distinguished French violinist, arrived in New York the 11th inst. on the Etruria, for his first concert tour in this country since 1877. He is now head professor at the Royal academy in London, and has never held a more prominent place as a violinist than at the present time, although he has been nearly forgotten in America. His concert tour will include most of the leading cities of the country. Mr. Sauret does not, like Ysaye, come of musical stock. His grandfather was a general of artillery under Napoleon, and he does not number a single musician among his ancestors.

OBITUARY.

THE death of Page Brown, the architect, is universally deplored by the entire community. This time, when Old Father Time has carried with him so bright, so buoyant, so hopeful a spirit as this young man, who came here eight years ago, and who put all his nervous, bonest, even passionate strength into the work which has produced the revolution of good taste and simplicity in San Francisco and California, it is indeed for us on the Pacific Coast a public calamity. Page Brown once said when he had numerous orders to fulfill: "How I wish I had remained in McKim, Meade & White's office, in New York, after I came back from Europe! I've got too much work to 'digest' here, and how I should like to have had two or three years to simply carry out one idea at a time!"

It was honest and pathetic, this, and he thoroughly meant it. His influence during his stay in California was a reflection of the great Richardson and White, but he lent a certain touch of original grace and genius to the masters whom he followed that was sui generis. Indeed, he seemed to grasp the meaning of our climate and of our hills and "steeps."

Since his accident three months ago at Burlingame, when he was thrown from a village-cart by the mad act of a vicious horse, he has been slowly dying, and his friends have realized that life was fading quickly away. Mr. Brown leaves a wife (the daughter of General Roger A. Pryor, of New York), and three children.

Signora Teresa Spivalo. There died in this city, January 17th, Signora Teresa Spivalo, the attorney. An Italian noblewoman, of the distinguished house of Balzano, which dates from the days of King Manfred, of Sicily, in 1230, and whose ancestors came into Tuscany with Frederick Second when he occupied Southern Italy, after Manfred's conquests, she possessed the dignity and grace which is ever noblesse oblige. Admired by so many of our citizens throughout the State during the early days, it is no wonder that, when this lady passed away at the age of eighty-four years, she should be mourned, not only by her beloved friends in San Francisco, but throughout the State. The wife of Captain G. Spivalo, she first visited California in 1840, and was the first Italian lady to come "round the Horn." Her memory was marvelous, and had a steel-like tenacity. Give her the cue, and she would readily recite any portion of Dante, Ariosto, Tasso, or Petrarch. The music of her words was indeed like the honey of Hyblis.

THE demand for California olive oil has been such since 1889 that the whole product has been sold almost as soon as offered. Last year's product was about 75,000 gallons. The United States has been importing annually 850,000 gallons of olive oil, with a great deal of cheap adulterated oil. There is thus an unlimited market for genuine native oil. Within ten years a new method of growing olive trees from small cuttings instead of from large limbs as formerly has reduced the expense of starting a tree from seven or eight dollars to ten or fifteen cents. It requires seven years to mature the young trees sufficiently to produce profitable crops. At ten years of age a tree bears from four to seven gallons of olives for each tree.—Self Culture.

THE finances of the Atlanta exposition appear to be in an uncertain condition, for it is said that all the buildings of the exposition company, including the woman's building, are mortgaged to secure a recent loan of $100,000 made to supply the deficit in the revenue. A syndicate with S. M. Inman, the railroad magnate at its head, advanced this money, and took the mortgage as security, and one of the conditions of the latter is that 12 1-2 per cent of the gate receipts shall be paid on its account each day. There is a loud protest from the managers of the woman's building at this probability that they may lose all they have put into it and the buildings which they are anxious to preserve.

When the Roman orator Cicero failed to acquit a poet client who was exiled to Marseilles, he received a letter saying, "I am happy in exile! I never tasted such oysters!" But then that was before the time of Moraghan, whose famous depot is in the California Market.

A POPULAR APPOINTMENT.

HARDLY any appointment of the past few years has given more universal satisfaction in commercial circles than the appointment of Captain P. T. Brown, the new Dredger Superintendent.

Captain P. T. Brown.

In fact, this time the Harbor Commissioners pleased everybody. Of course for the past six years he has been constantly in the State employ, and in charge of Dredger No. 1, but his steadfast attention to the problem of improving our water front and his magnificent executive ability have repeatedly won the respect and admiration of the Commissioners—and yet, several times when it has been intimated that he might easily attain his present official position he quietly declined to make any endeavor in the shape of what he termed "a fight" for the place. And now the office has sought the man successfully. Probably no one knows the needs of our bay better than Captain Brown. Long years of efficient service have given him a knowledge which few possess. A stern advocate of economy, he is painfully scrupulous in matters concerning public expenditure.

It is a comment upon his disinterestedness that he did not know even that the Board was considering him, until his appointment was announced.

MY PLAYMATES.—EUGENE FIELD.

THE wind comes whispering to me of the country green and cool,
Of redwing blackbirds chattering beside a ready pool;
It brings me soothing fancies of the homestead on the hill,
And I hear the thrush's evening song and the robin's morning trill;
So I fall to thinking tenderly of those I used to know
Where the sassafras and snakeroot and checkerberries grow.

What has become of Ezra Marsh, who lived on Baker's Hill?
And what's become of Noble Pratt, whose father kept the mill?
And what's become of Lizzie Crum and Anastasia Snell,
And of Roxie Root, who tended school in Boston for a spell?
They were the boys and they the girls who shared my youthful play;
They do not answer to my call! My playmates, where are they?

What has become of Levi and his little brother Joe,
Who lived next door to where we lived some forty years ago?
I'd like to see the Newton boys and Quincy Adams Brown,
And Hepsy Hall and Ella Cowles who spelled the whole school down!
And Gracie Smith, the Cutler boys, Leander Snow, and all
Who I am sure would answer could they only hear my call!

I'd like to see Bill Warner and the Conkey boys again,
And talk about the time we used to wish that we were men!
And one, I shall not name her, could I see her gentle face
And hear her girlish treble in this distant, lonely place!
The flowers and hopes of springtime, they perished long ago.
And the garden where they blossomed is white with winter snow.

O cottage 'neath the maples, have you seen those girls and boys
That but a little while ago made, oh! such pleasant noise?
O trees, and hills, and brooks, and lanes, and meadows, do you know
Where I shall find my little friends of forty years ago?
Yon see, I'm old and weary, and I've traveled long and far;
I am looking for my playmates; I wonder where they are!

WHEN I WAS A BOY.—EXCHANGE.

Up in the attic where I slept

When I was a boy, a little boy,
In through the lattice the moonlight crept,
Bringing a tide of dreams that swept
Over the low, red trundle-bed,
Bathing the tangled, curly head.
While moon-beams played at hide-and-seek
With the dimples on the sun-browned cheek—

When I was a boy, a little boy.

And O! the dreams—the dreams I dreamed!

When I was a boy, a little boy!
For the grace that through the lattice streamed
Over my folded eyelids seemed
To have the gift of prophecy,
And to bring me glimpses of times to be
When manhood's clarion seemed to call—
Ah! that was the sweetest dream of all,
When I was a boy, a little boy.

I'd like to sleep where I used to sleep,

When I was a boy, a little boy!
For in at the lattice the moon would peep,
Bringing her tide of dreams to sweep
The crosses and griefs of the years away
From the heart that is weary and faint to-day;
And those dreams should give me back again
A peace I have never known since then—

When I was a boy, a little boy!

EXPERIENCE.—ALICE MARLAND ROLLINS.

A child laid in the grave ere it had known

Earth held delight beyond its mother's kiss:—

A fair girl passing from a world like this

Unto God's vast eternity, alone:—

A brave man's soul in one brief instant thrown

To deepest agony from highest bliss:—

A woman stealing her young heart to miss

All joys in life, one dear one having flown:—

These have I seen; yet happier these, I said,

Than one who, by experience made strong,

Learning to live without the precious dead,

Survive despair, outlive remorse and wrong,

Can say when new grief comes, with unbowed head,

"Let me not mourn! I shall forget ere long!"

THE LATEST AND THE BEST BRAND OUT

DEAR EDITH.—With all the mad extravagance in dress this winter, there has begun a wild craze for jewels—especially diamonds. The other day it was announced that a large Anglo-French-American syndicate was trying to buy up all the loose diamonds in the world, but, undoubtedly, the rumor was founded on the present enormous demand for them at home and abroad. The tiny watches pinned to gay corsages fairly blaze with sparkling gems of all colors of the rainbow—chiefly diamonds, however—make a resplendent decoration. There is always a dazzling pin above, from which they dangle by links of gems. In short, they resemble the imperial decorations of Austria or Spain more than any thing else one can think of at first sight.

Rings are set with fifteen or twenty radiating and varying colors in stones, arranged in a square block. The Marquise ring has in some way lost its vogue, although if it is a relic of one's ancestral jewels, it is in perfectly good form.

It is a fad now, I am told in a New York letter, to follow a custom very swagger and appertaining to the haute noblesse of old Europe—to have a jeweled armorial ring. For instance, I saw one made in this city the other day to order by a prominent jewelry firm. It was to be an engagement ring, and was really, to my mind, an odd and fantastic conceit. The club man who ordered it for his fiancée is of an old Boston family with a mellow old English pedigree and a coat-of-arms with many quarterings. However, his own family escutcheon reads:

"On a Field Or, Three Lozenges, Azure."

All of which means that on a shield of gold shall be placed three blue gems—diamond shaped.

The clubman's ring was fashioned thuswise: The little shield was in the form of the graceful Parise, as it used to be called in the days of chivalry; which was a shield with an inward curve, wide at the top, and narrowing rapidly and gracefully to a sharp point at the bottom. This shield was constructed of plain gold, with a narrow raised rim. Grouped in heraldic form were three beautiful amethysts, the hue of the blue, cut diamond wise, only a narrow gold band with five stones of Beryl at intervals.

These rings are extremely popular in London just now, as I hear is the goldsmith's and silversmith's art, and it has quickly reached New York and Boston. Young women of fashion and wealth amuse themselves at their leisure moments by fashioning dainty trinkets in the precious metals for their friends. They procure a diminutive forge and carry on the art in miniature. Some of the work is very creditable, and, at times, highly and veritably artistic. Miss de Hoghton, daughter of Sir H. de Hoghton, whose father is second in precedence in the English baronetcy, actually set the fashion in London society, and gradually it drifted over to Boston.

But now of dress: The new striped glacé silks are making an immense hit. They come in red, black, brown and blue, and are very suitable for winter.

A pretty tailor-made cloth gown is of fancy knotted tweed, in reds or olive greens. The gored skirt is braided in a graceful design with black and gold braid. The jacket bodice, both in front and on the basque, is likewise trimmed, as well as the cuffs—à la mousquetaire. The vest is of red velvet. The yoke effect is secured by braiding, which reaches to the red velvet epaulettes with scalloped edges. All in all, it is a mighty chic gown. BELINDA.

ELECTRIC HEATING.—It is calculated that at the present time eleven times as much coal is required to generate electricity for heating a building as to produce steam for the same purpose. Under the most favorable auspices electric heating is twice as expensive as steam.

The expensive and elaborate work necessary for the erection of the building and procuring a supply of fresh sea water daily for the Lurline Baths has been highly appreciated by the citizens of San Francisco. Here they can be accommodated with hot and cold salt water at any time in the day and enjoy a tub bath or a swim without going to the beach. The baths are situated on the corner of Bush and Larkin streets, in the very heart of the city.

I OFTEN wonder if the average racing man ever thinks of the enormous drain on vitality and longevity that the modern trained method entails, says "An Idler" in that bright Cycling Journal, Cycling West. We hear of men getting themselves into condition in a month or less. In condition for what? For an almost criminal expenditure of nervous energy, physical and mental, for the violent and spasmodic over exertion of all the most important muscles and vital organs, for the suicidal exactions on functions which it is crime to stimulate and over excite. Life is measured by heart beats, and to accelerate their time is to encourage dissolution. A barrel is emptied just in chronological proportion as to whether the leaking drops drip slowly or fast. Physiologists fix the life period of professional athletes as being under forty years—commonly thirty-five or six. Is the evanescent glory of winning a $10 race—or an ephemeral record even less valuable—worth the loss of two score years at the best end of life?

IDA Trafford Bell, in the Wheelwoman, says: "Human beings are like animals. Cage them and they become ugly but give them such freedom as nature intended, and the animal, which in a hot, artificial atmosphere will attempt your life, will, under natural conditions, be your friend and playfellow. So with woman. Burden and harass her with a thousand petty cares, keep her shut up day after day within the walls of her home, and you will soon begin to wonder why some women have such awful impossible dispositions, and feel sorry for the husband who prefers his club, and the children who prefer the streets to home. Such women are not fit to train children, and yet in this country they are the rule rather than the exception."

BICYCLING as a means of restful exercise now scarcely needs to be pointed out. As a woman said lately: "The beauty of the wheel's cure of insomnia, incipient nervous prostration, and the rest of the ills of the overworked is that it cures in spite of unfaith, want of skill or any handicap. You get on your wheel, and there is no getting away from it; it must absorb your attention; you cannot worry about the children, the house, the office, finances—any of your cares—you have got to think about your poise on the wheel and watch your surroundings, and in so doing you get out of yourself in spite of yourself. Every physician will tell you that this is all that is needed." And this is the secret of the whole thing.

A PARISIAN fashion writer says: "Except for park cycling the only fit material for costumes is woolen. This cyclist departure for women is opening a wide field to the knitter. Pyrenean wool is lighter than Shetland, and is greatly used in waistcoats and summer cycling jackets. The Pyrenean women give touches of fancy and brightness to these garments which remind one of the costumes of professional Spanish hull-fighters."

SCREWING and unscrewing nuts and bolts never benefits a machine. Loosen and alter them only when it is absolutely necessary for you to do so. See that both are at all times kept screwed up tightly. Failure to do this may result in injury to both the machine and yourself.

FIRST TRAVELER—While in Africa I faced two lions, a tiger and three elephants, in the same jungle, and I'm alive yet. SECOND TRAVELER—Huh! That's nothing. While in Texas I howed to a girl that three Mexicans were in love with.—New York Weekly.

The wise man of the world, who knows more things than he commonly talks about, is a genial, tolerant soul, who wants to enjoy the same freedom that he cheerfully extends to others. When he wants a drink he takes it like a gentleman, and being a connoisseur, he drinks only that which is good for him. For this reason he calls for Argonaut whiskey, and makes sure that he is getting the genuine article. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are the agents for this popular and wholesome article.

IN a family living not far from James street an amusing incident happened the other day. The family includes a little boy about ten years of age. During the conversation at the dinner table he used some bad language. His mother naturally reproved him severely for it. "Why, Shakespeare uses those words," exclaimed the lad. "Well, then, you musn't play with Shakespeare any more," was the prompt and cautious reply of the horrified mother.—Syracuse Post.

MRS. JOLLIBOY—My husband takes regular exercise at the club gymnasium now, and I judge from what he says that he is getting on finely. MRS. KINGSLEY—Has he become expert enough to do anything? MRS. JOLLIBOY—He tells me that he has learned how to crook his elbow, though I don't know what that means exactly.—Detroit Free Press.

THE teacher was asking questions—teachers are quite apt to ask questions, and they sometimes receive curious answers. The question was as follows: "Now, pupils, how many months have twenty-eight days?" "All of them, teacher," replied the boy on the front seat.—Utica Observer.

HERR BECKER—Marie, it strikes me you waste a lot of precious time with your poodle. FRAU BECKER—Poor creature! I often feel sorry for him. He has no club to go to of an evening and amuse himself four or five hours at a stretch.—Deutscher Soldatenhort.

HARGRAVES—You know that time I was so sick last summer? I just heard that the doctor gave me up once. FERRY—I heard that he gave you up twice. "Twice?" "Yes. The second time after he had been trying to collect his bill."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

HUSBAND (shaving)—Confound the razor! WIFE—What's the matter now? You're dreadfully cross-tempered. HUSBAND—The razor is so infernally dull. WIFE—Dull? Why, I ripped up an old skirt with it yesterday, and it cut beautifully.—Chicago Record.

BOBBY—Popper, what does the paper mean by the women of the hour? MR. FERRY—I guess it means the woman who says she will be ready to start in 15 minutes. An hour is about as near as she comes to it usually.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

MRS. HENRY PECK—Bah! I only married you because I pitied you when nobody else thought anything about you. MR. HENRY PECK—Ah, well, my dear, everybody pities me now.—Punch.

MRS. WAGGLES—Doesn't your husband suffer dreadfully with rheumatism? MRS. WIGGLES—Yes, but it's nothing to what the rest of us have to endure.—Sommerville Journal.

MISS GUSH—Oh, Captain, were you ever hoarded by a pirate? CAPTAIN STORMS—Yes. He charged me $11 a day for a hall room on the fourth floor.—Cleveland World.

PROSPECTIVE TENANT—But we wish to keep a servant. LANDLORD OF FLAT—Oh, very well. I will have an alcove painted on the wall of the kitchen.—Detroit Tribune.

SHE—Have you seen that maunish Miss Strider in bloomers? HE—No. SHE—It's awful; she raises her hat now when she meets women in skirts!—Exchange.

"ER—I want some sort of a present for a young lady." "Sweetheart or sister?" "Er—why—she hasn't said which she will be yet."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

AGATHA—Charley is tickled with his new mustache, isn't he? MARIE—Yes, but (with a sly blush) not half as much as I am.—New York World.

POKER DON'TS

HERE are a few poker don'ts which are apparently the result of long experience with the game.

Don't ask what's trumps when playing poker. The other players may think you are jesting and frown upon you by means of a chair.

Don't expect to win every time you make a bet. There are lots of people still living who disobeyed this rule, but most of them are in the poor house.

Don't deal yourself more cards than you deal the others. Besides being an extremely selfish habit, it also causes adverse criticism and oftentimes sudden death.

Don't put all the chips you have in the center of the table for a bluff and then try to pull them back suddenly if somebody "sees" you. People have been severely injured for doing this very thing.

Don't open a jackpot with a pair of treys. Some players who have done this thing in a thoughtless moment are alive and well, others are in the hospital, and not a few have left this vain world entirely.

Don't, when playing with strangers, ask permission to examine their inside pockets and look up their sleeves for a cold deck. Such a proceeding is very rude and ungentlemanly, and might cause some one to rise-up-Willie-Riley and smite you athwart the cheek.

Don't get angry when some one calls you and discovers that you have been talking eagerly with nothing in your hand save a flush that has the spring-half at one end. According to Hoyle, the rule in this case is to smile blandly, excuse yourself politely, retire into the hall and fall carelessly out of the second-story window.

Don't get excited and say unkind things when everybody passes out just when you have four aces. The proper caper under such circumstances is to slip the four aces up your sleeve and await a more favorable opportunity. If any of the other players should notice this action, however, apologize profusely and mention that you mistook your sleeve for the deck. They look very much alike, anyhow.

Don't forget to look carefully at your cards before betting everything you have on earth. It is very embarrassing to find that you have a gold brick straight after you have bet all your goods and chattels on its being strictly up to date. Cavendish says that when you make a break of this kind the rule is to bid the other players good night in a quiet, gentlemanly manner, and then go out and allow a policeman to kick you hurriedly around the block.—New York World.

PECULIARITIES OF LIGHTNING.

PERSONS struck by lightning have had small holes drilled in the skull, but otherwise they were not marked. Victims have been horribly burned, and even dismembered. A stroke of lightning has cut off a man's ear, or shaved his hair and beard clean, and not hurt him in any other way. The markings are often curious. Blue is the common color, but they have been red, green, and black, and occasionally the whole body turns black. Negroes who have been struck by lightning have had their skin bleached in spots to absolute whiteness. One negro struck by lightning found, after he had recovered consciousness, that he had one completely white arm, the rest of his body being as black as usual. Blindness, deafness, and either total or partial paralysis, are frequent consequences of lightning strokes. Sometimes the lightning selects a single object on a man's person, and assaults that without apparently touching the man himself. Coins have been melted until they stuck together in a man's pocket, whilst he suffered no ill consequences. Keys, watches and watch-chains, metal cartridges, and eyeglass frames have been more or less damaged, whilst the persons wearing them were almost uninjured. Clothing, too, has been almost demolished without injury to its wearer. Iron tacks have been pulled out of shoes, and rubber boots destroyed frequently. The brass eyelets were once torn out of a man's shoes, but he hardly felt the shock.

MOTHERS, be sure and use "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for your children while teething

THE SAND-BATH AS A CURATIVE AGENT.—"The Mohammedans, in their ablutions," says Cosmos, "replace water by sand when needful. Invalids have been completely or partially cured by sand heated to a temperature varying, according to the case, from 45 to 65 degrees C. The sand, containing air between its particles and being a bad conductor of heat, transmits it in a gentle and almost insensible manner. Perspiration is favored up to the point where a patient may lose two quarts of liquid in one sand-bath. Thanks to this evaporation, the invalid may support continued high temperature without the actual temperature of the body rising more than a few degrees, and this without fear of heart affections, if care be taken to put hot sand on the feet at the outset. The number of ailments that may be treated by this powerful curative agent is considerable. In the first place it is especially beneficial to chronic rheumatism and to gout. Neuralgia and sciatica are cured or benefited by local or general baths. The most various organic troubles of the nervous system, cardiac or digestive affections have been treated by this method, sometimes with remarkable success. The same is true of tuberculous affections of the bones and joints. — Translated for The Literary Digest.

LEMON JUICE A CURE FOR DIPHTHERIA.—"For many years," says The Magazine of Pharmacy, "pure lemon-juice has been recommended as the best tonic for diphtheria and sore throat in general, and we have known a case in which the son of a medical man in one of the Paris hospitals cured himself of diphtheria by constantly sucking oranges or lemons, a small basketful of which were placed for this purpose at his bedside. We see that a Danish physician, Dr. Boeck, of Copenhagen, recommends, in the treatment of diphtheria, a ten-per-cent. solution of citric acid, to be given in spoonful doses every two hours."

A SUBSTITUTE FOR GOLD.—A French journal describes a new and promising substitute for gold. It is produced by alloying ninety-four parts of copper with six of antimony, the copper being first melted and the antimony afterward added. To this a quantity of magnesium carbonate is added to increase its specific gravity. The alloy is capable of being drawn out, wrought, and soldered just as gold is, and is said to take and retain as fine a polish as gold. Its cost is a shilling a pound.

OBTAINING EARTHWORMS.—Every fisherman knows the value of earthworms as bait; they are also an excellent food for young birds, fishes, etc. According to La Nature, they can be got anywhere by simply wetting the ground with a solution of cupric sulphate (blue vitriol)—10 grammes to a quart of water—which will bring them out in surprising numbers, almost immediately. Soap suds have the same effect.

CIGAR STORE ON WHEELS.—A perambulating cigar store is the latest Berlin development of the world's new-born love of wheels. A magnificent glass case is mounted on a sort of quadriga which receives motive power from the limbs of the proprietor, who is seated just behind the case. At night the whole affair is brilliantly lighted by electricity. — Exchange.

PERFUME IN FLOWERS.—It is claimed that the perfume of flowers disappears as soon as the starch in the petals is exhausted and it may, it is said, be restored by placing the flower in a solution of sugar, when the formation of starch and the emission of fragrance will be at once resumed.

THERE are some curious anomalies in the present game law of California, and it is likely that the Supreme Court will some day be called upon to decide as to its constitutionality. The shooting of quail, ducks and geese is unlawful except between the 15th of October and the 15th of February, while it is unlawful to sell or expose for sale such game except between the 15th of November and the 15th of January. Thus for two months in which game may be lawfully shot it may not be lawfully sold. This would seem to the lay mind to involve an interference with the rights of property. What a man may lawfully possess, one would suppose, he may lawfully sell, unless it be something whose sale may be prohibited on moral grounds, such as opium or spirits. The law, as it stands, discriminates unfairly in favor of the sportsman against the mass of the people who cannot afford the luxury of gunning, and who must perforce either buy game or go without it.

THE world of letters knows that the moral tone of Mr. Austin's works has had more to do with his elevation to the Laureateship than his poetry. As a poet he is not to be compared with Swinburne, but the English people could not afford to have the author of "Poems and Ballads" in the Laureate's chair, even if he has repeated of his earlier errors. Mr. Austin is sixty years of age, and a Conservative, which, no doubt, also helped him to get his promotion.

TWO pages of a manuscript poem in the handwriting of Chatterbox were recently purchased for the Bristol Library for seventy pounds. There is no doubt about the genuineness of the manuscript, and the poem, "Kew Gardens," was first published in 1837.

THERE is a child like simplicity in the faith manifested by mass meetings, conventions, boards of trade, chambers of commerce and other bodies which solemnly adopt long-winded resolutions or "memorials," addressed to the Congress of the United States. The waste-basket is the natural destination of all such wearisome rubbish. A memorial or set of resolutions from such sources has no more effect upon legislation at Washington than upon the flow of the Gulf-stream. The River Improvement Convention, which closed its labors here last week, followed the farcical custom of addressing a long memorial to Congress, but it is certain that if California wants favor in the next river and harbor bill, it will take a hard week at Washington to win it.

THIS week has been the liveliest since Christmas in society life, and the indications are that the ball will be kept rolling merrily from now on until Lent comes upon the scene. Theatre parties were more numerous on Monday night than for several weeks past; the Olympics had a crowded audience at the Columbia, and, the Baldwin being out of the line, the California was well patronized. The Monday Evening Club gave their monthly dance at Golden Gate Hall; several dinner parties preceded it, and the party was very successful. Tuesday evening's hop at the Presidio was, as usual, delightful. Wednesday was largely given over to dinners, and Mrs. Boardman gave a whist party; on Thursday evening there was a dance at the Hotel Oliver, and last night Ed. Greenway led the cotillion of the Friday Fortnightlies, at Lunt's Hall. Today, at Mrs. Jewett's, Miss O'Connell will give the third of her recitals, which will be entitled: "The Maids and Matrons of the Revolution," and the fancy dress dinner at Mrs. Paul Jarboe's will be the novelty of the week; tableaux and dancing will fill in the evening hours, to which quite a number of additional guests have been asked, Miss Kate Jarboe and her father, Mr. Bull, being the especial guests of the affair. The Partington studio has been much sought this week, and the display made by the Guild of Arts and Crafts pronounced to be interesting, instructive, and a remarkably fine one.

The young ladies had several causes for complaint regarding their Leap Year Cotillion last Friday night. The navy chaps were among the missing, and the night proved to be not alone the first wet one the club has had this winter for their re-unions, but absolutely the most inclement of the season so far. The storm had but slight effect upon the attendance, which was among the largest the club has ever had; the young ladies who officiated as leaders, Miss Sallie Maynard, in white, Miss Emily Hager, in pink, and Miss Sara Collier, in blue, were warmly complimented upon their success as such, and, though none of the figures were new, they were all pretty and well executed.

There were several gatherings on Saturday, and, in spite of the very threatening state of the weather, none of the hostesses had cause to complain. At Mrs. Jewett's the second of Miss Lillian O'Connell's recitals was given, her theme being, "Through Colonial Doorways," with musical selections by Miss Adler. The house warming reception given by Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Mann, at their handsome new home on Washington street, was a charming affair. In the afternoon it took the form of a musicale tea, when a large number of their friends were present. In the evening music was again the feature of the entertainment, to which only a few of their more intimate friends were bidden, a delicious supper capping the climax of their enjoyment. The Misses Smith gave a tea also on Saturday last at the parental residence, on Webster and Broadway.

The wedding of Miss Rose Walter and Abe Miertief, the anticipation of which has been for weeks stirring our Jewish elite, took place on last Tuesday evening at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. D. N. Walter, on Van Ness avenue, and was celebrated with unusual splendor. The Walter residence is one of the most spacious in the city, and on this occasion was thrown open to the guests, adorned with all the decorative skill for which Miss Mary Bates and her corps of assistants are noted. Flowers, bamboos and ribbons were used in profusion, the chief point of interest centering on the reception room, where the bridal bower was fashioned in the corner bay window, of bamboo poles, white flowers, satin ribbons and gauze, from the center of which hung, not the usual wedding bell, but an antique silver lamp, an heirloom in the family for over two hundred years, a bright star shining from it with brilliant effect. The pink brocaded satin walls of this beautiful apartment served as a bright background for large wreaths of white pinks and satin ribbons. Between this room and the adjoining library Miss Bates' favorite fret-work was introduced in the doorway, composed of almond blossoms and pink ribbons, a darker shade of plum colored and white ribbons being used for the doorway into the hall. The library was a wealth of bloom, flowers in baskets, which were artistically arranged on the bookshelves; the music room was in white and gold, ribbon bow knots, and green garlands; on one side of the room a charming conceit was the hanging of the numberless congratulatory telegrams, received by the happy couple, on a silken cord, so that actually "all who ran could read." The hall was exceedingly effective in its trimming of dark green foliage and bunches of bright marigolds and red peppers tied with yellow ribbons. Amid all this fragrance flitted gaily dressed guests, making the scene brilliant in the extreme. At half-past eight o'clock the strains of the wedding march gave notice of the approach of the bridal party, and shortly after the cortege appeared, passed through the hall to the reception room, and took their places in the lovely bridal bower, where the Rev. Rabbi Voorsanger awaited them. The four ushers, Messrs. H. D. Walter, Albert Frank, I. W. Hellmau, Jr., and Isadore Fleishman, led the way; then came Mrs. Walter, the mother of the bride, and William Haas; the groom was next with his sister, Mrs. Baruch, and then appeared the pretty maid-of-honor, Miss Alice Greenebaum; last of all the fair bride, leaning upon her father's arm. Her rich brunette beauty never showed to greater advantage than in her beautiful bridal robe of ivory white satin, which fell in lustrous folds round her girlish figure, the corsage one mass of embroidery done in seed pearls, with point lace reverses; a tulle veil and bouquet of natural orange blossoms completed her costume. Miss Alice Greenebaum, the sole bridesmaid, wore a lovely gown of pure white silk and tulle; she carried white roses in her bouquet. The sister of the bride, Mrs. Moses Heller, wore a superb gown of yellow satin; Mrs. Walter's gown was of rich black velvet, with front of white satin embroidered in gold. She also wore magnificent diamonds. The groom's sister, Mrs. Baruch, wore a gown of rose brocade and point lace, a very stylish and effective costume. The marriage ceremony ended, congratulations were offered, and supper was served later. The decorations of the supper room were in green, ferns and smilax predominating; innumerable lamps added to the brilliancy of the scene. Dancing was resumed after the feast and kept up long after the bridal pair had departed. The presents were some of the most valuable and profuse ever bestowed upon a bride in our city.

During the first week in February St. Luke's Church will be the scene of two society weddings—that of Miss Isabella Grant and E. D. Pond will be an evening ceremony, taking place at 8:30 p. m. on Monday, the 3rd; while Miss Kate Jarboe's nuptials with J. Case Bull will be celebrated at noon on Thursday, the 6th.

Among the engagement announcements of the week are those of Miss Mattie Whittier and W. B. Weir, of New York; Miss Blanche Castle and Charles Farquharson; Miss Millie Greenebaum and Dr. Herbert W. Hatch.

The engagement is announced of Miss Georgia M. Wightman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Wightman, Jr., to Mr. Douglass B. Crane of the Occidental & Oriental Steamship Company.

The fancy dress ball which will be given at the Art Institute on California street on Mardi Gras is another charming event to look forward to, and if it proves half as pleasant as some of its predecessors under the same auspices, it will be a very delightful one indeed. The Deux Temps Club of Oakland are also meditating something upon the same lines, to take place ere the season closes. The Saturday Morning Orchestra are down on the cards for a concert at the Christian Association Auditorium on the evening of Monday, February 16th. Their efforts have always been in the cause of charity and it is understood that at the coming event they themselves will be the beneficiaries.

Recent dinners have been numerous and large. Mrs. Millie Ashe-Sewell the guest of honor at several of them. Mr. Jim Phelan playing the host to her at the Bohemian Club, and Mr. Ed. Sheldon at his own residence on Pierce street. Miss Goad and Mr. O. Hooker were chief guests at the dinner given by Mrs. Montford Wilson. Colonel Fred Crocker's dinner was in honor of Mr. J. Slott Fassett, who has apparently found it difficult to tear himself away from the Pacific Coast. Mrs. Sam Knight, Mrs. Henry Scott, Mrs. Miller, Mrs. Von Schroeder, Mrs. Hopkins, Mrs. Hager and Mrs. Tevis also appeared in the role of dinner hostesses. Mrs. H. Greenbaum and Mrs. I. N. Walter have also given elaborate dinners in honor of the recently engaged couple, Miss Stella Greenbaum and Alfred Simon, whose marriage will be an event of the near future.

At the second of the Colonial Recitals which Miss Lilian O'Connell is giving under Mrs. J. H. Jewett's auspices, a large audience, gazing "Through Colonial Doorways," saw the gorgeously gowned figure of Lady Stuyvesant, wife of the Governor of New Amsterdam, standing in an antique drawing-room. The subject of the recital, the gay life in New York under the Dutch, and afterward under the British rule, was amusingly treated, as was the aristocratic regime in Virginia under the great Proprietors. Miss O'Connell's best work, however, was in her rendering of Celia Thaxter's weird poem, "The Cruise of the 'Mystery,'" (a slave ship), which held the audience spell-bound by its tragic realism. A dainty ballad composed in the fifteenth century, and exquisitely sung by Miss Adler, added to the enjoyment of the occasion.

There are many pleasant affairs on the programme for next week, chief among them the domino party which Colouel and Mrs. George H. Burton intend giving in the hop room at the Presido on Wednesday evening. Domino parties are a great pleasure to the ladies, but it is a mooted point whether the men find them equally so, being, as they are, so completely at the mercy of the fair sex. This one will take the form of a cotillion, which will be led by Miss Minnie Burton. On Friday night the last dance of the Friday Night Cotillion Club will take place at Odd Fellows' Hall; it will be an assembly. At the Maple Hall of the Palace the Entre Nous Club will give their Leap Year Cotillion.

At the annual meeting of the Mizpah, held Monday afternoon, the following officers were chosen for the new year: Mrs. Harry Clarke, President; Mrs. W. O. Farnsworth, Vice President; Mrs. T. J. Schuyler, Recording Secretary; Miss M. L. Elliott, Corresponding Secretary; Mrs. B. Day, Treasurer. The report of the Secretary showed that during the last year committees had made seventy-four visits to the needy, twenty-six families had been assisted, and 195 garments made for different charitable institutions. The Mizpah is the charitable club of the Western Addition, is doing a vast deal of good, and is in a flourishing condition.

The Entre Nous Cotillion will give a Fancy Dress Leap Year german on next Friday evening, at the Palace Hotel. Miss Nancy Place will act as leader, assisted by Mrs. Frank L. Platt and Misses Charlotte Gruenhagen and Mae B. Ludlow. It promises to be one of the most successful and brilliant gatherings of the season.

Mrs. McCutcheon's progressive encre party and the McBean theatre and supper party have been among recent pleasant affairs.

On Tuesday evening January 28th, Mrs. B. W. Paulsen will leave on the Sunset Limited train for New York.

HON. D. T. Cole has now been a member of the State Board of Harbor Commissioners for three years, and his vigilance and energy in office have proved a pleasant surprise to those who first were his rivals, and at the same time fulfilled the hopes completely of his host of friends. Mr. Cole is a stannish Republican in politics, and came to this State in pioneer days. A thorough business man, he is especially regarded by merchants and shippers for his hearty endeavor to improve the condition of our water front. As a prominent member of the well-known firm of Moore, Hunt & Co., he is an important figure in our business community.

KATE Field has straddled a horse in Hawaii which seems quite natural for Kate. She was thought to be pretty nice on both sides of every subject here. How big she must feel on a little island, but then she always felt that way quite independently of comparative environments. But the Hawaiian must not take for granted that the United States is merely a field full of such Kates. Our Kates are limited in many ways, and our Junes are much more blushing, though not much the younger. Kate is a squaller from stormville, and she will not sojourn long in realms of good weather. She is, in short, one of Uncle Sam's men who happened to be a woman. A knowledge of Kate Field and Joaquin Miller ought to decrease the annexation sentiment in the Islands. But, fortunately, President Dole is one of Uncle Sam's nephews, and knows, from immediate source of knowledge, that the relative drawbacks are not numerous, and that Kate and Joaquin are not representative people, and do not express a Congress of sentiment.

RUSSIA, whose calendar is twelve days behind ours, proposes to change the Gregorian calendar after the beginning of the new century. The authorities have not yet decided whether to jump over the thirteen days at once or to accomplish their object gradually by omitting the first twelve leap years of the century.

IT is my opinion that a man's soul may be buried and perish under a dung-heap, or in a furrow of the field, just as well as under a pile of money," said Nathaniel Hawthorne.

THE CARE OF TOOTH-BRUSHES.—The care of tooth-brushes is not sufficiently observed. In our city houses, a writer properly remarks, they stand in their cups or hang on their racks above the set toilet-bowls day and night, absorbing any disease germs that may be floating about. They should be washed frequently—at least about twice a week—in some antiseptic solution, strong salt and water or bicarbonate of sodium and water being two good and readily provided cleansers. Tooth washes and pastes should also be kept carefully covered.

WANTED.—For the pulpit of a wealthy and fashionable Congregational Church, in San Francisco, a homely clergyman who will give bonds to behave himself. One who has no past scandals in his career preferred. Salary liberal.

WITH Colonel Burns hastening back from Mexico to take a hand on the Republican side, and General Buckley issuing commands to his wing of the Democracy, the immediate outlook for pure politics in San Francisco is good.

MRS. Carrie Chapman Catt (heaven send her a better name), is of the opinion that it is possible to build up a great national party, based on the one idea of the enfranchisement of women. No doubt; all things are possible with God. But has Mrs. Catt ever reflected that it is likewise possible to build up a great national party on the single idea of the disfranchisement of men? Why not blend the two ideas into one glorious whole? Sic semper tyrannis!

GERMANY'S war lord appears to have crawled into the hole made by the explosion caused by his despatch to President Kruger. Quiet is becoming to a young man who makes a bluff and gets called. And Congress is putting this country in the way of knowing just how Emperor William feels. One of our challenges may be accepted any day, and then we shall be in the fix of the bad man who has no gun.

OUR esteemed contemporary, the Examiner, appears to be anxious to attract not only the attention of the public, but that of the police also. Its enterprise in exploiting the dives with pen and pencil, and its enthusiastic devotion in its Sunday issues to the Female Leg, surpass anything that has ever been seen in local journalism. It is easily the most indecent paper this side of New York, and has only to be prosecuted for obscenity in order to take undisputed metropolitan rank.

IT will not be easy to make the Californian friends of John Hays Hammond believe he is the sort of man the despatches picture. According to them he, with others, invited Dr. Jameson to invade the Transvaal, and stood ready to take arms when the raid was made, but instead of doing that hoisted the Boer flag when the fighting began. This would make Hammond out to be a double traitor and a coward. Nothing in his character, as it was revealed here, would warrant the belief that he could have been guilty of such baseness as is imputed to him.

EMPEROR William of Germany occasionally makes a sensible suggestion, in matters where his personal vanity is not concerned. He is credited with the remark that Cuba is lost to Spain, and that the Spanish Government's best course would be to sell the island to the United States while there remains any right worth buying. It is likely that Spain could make a profitable surrender to this country of all her claims upon Cuba, and that Cuba would be glad of the opportunity to be admitted to the Union, either as a territory or an independent State. Even if we did not acquire the island outright, something like a protectorate could be established, with satisfaction to all concerned.

JAPAN is giving orders for two battle-ships and four armored cruisers. Evidently she means to hold her own in the Pacific. She is anticipating trouble with Russia, and does not propose to be taken unprepared. The island empire is setting this country a good example.

THERE is something exceedingly ludicrous in Hall Caine's serious suggestion that Canada may yet embroil England in war with this country over the Canadian copyright question. That's just like an author. Every writer of books magnifies enormously the importance of his craft. As a matter of fact, if there is one thing that the people of this country are wholly indifferent about, it is the copyright question. Save authors and publishers, no one cares a rap about it.

PERRY Belmont has served notice on his brother that neither he nor his bride, Mrs. Vanderbilt that was, can play hereafter in any of Perry's yards, front or rear. Still, as Blenheim is open to the pair, the chances are they will have all the opportunities for dancing that they care for. That being so, exclusion from Perry's parlors, and other New York drawing-rooms, is robbed of its terrors. It is possible to live without being admitted to the festivals of New York society so long as one has the nobility of England to fall back on.

THE brethren of the First Congregational Church are persuaded that it is the wicked Mrs. Davidson and not good Dr. Brown who must be tried first. And should Mrs. Davidson be convicted of blackmail the verdict, doubtless, will be construed as the acquittal of the beloved pastor, who has the misfortune to be charged with adultery. It is the straight way in which churchly intelligence goes to the nub of things that excites the respect of the worldly mind, and draws sane souls to join the communion of the Saints. Besides, adultery, as the brethren perceive, may or may not be a serious offense. It depends on who commits it.

CANADA is heavily in debt, for a young country, and is cursed with a corrupt and extravagant government. The Conservative party has held office for many years, and knows how to play on the popular heart. The late war scare has led to estimates of over a million dollars for military purposes, to be expended in the Dominion during the year. It seems absurd for the Canadians to be arming against the United States, seeing that Canada is scarcely exposed to attack from any other source. But if it makes them feel better to carry guns and play soldier, that is no reason why they should not also play in our yard, if they want to, until war actually comes.

THE late storms brought out upon the streets a number of bloomer-clad damsels, who seemed to take a peculiar delight in the exhibition of their—well, their independence of conventionalities. Bloomers are, in fact, sensible garments for wet weather, which nobody can deny, and while themselves shapeless they serve admirably to set off shapeliness in the wearer. But they are very trying, and a masculine woman, with sharp angles where there should be curves, looks in this form of raiment a veritable scarecrow. Even worse, if possible, is the appearance of the fat woman in bloomers. However, as one swallow does not make a summer, neither does a single pair of bloomers on the street set the fashion. The day of bloomers, for street wear, has not yet come. For these and other mercies, Lord make us truly thankful.

WANTED: AN ALTERNATIVE FOR REFUNDING.

THE man who will not consider all the essential elements of a problem has not qualified himself to form, much less to express an opinion as to its solution. That is the position exactly of Mayor Sutro and his committee of fifty in regard to the proposal to refund the railroad's indebtedness to the Government. They will not—dare not—say what better plan they have to substitute for that which now holds the field. Upon any other conceivable scheme they would divide and split into fragments. A number of them, being cranks, favored the Government taking and operating the roads. Another section of them, being gifted with more worldly wisdom, saw at once that such a proposal would never do; that it was opposed to the whole frame work and genius of our Government; that it would not bear the test of examination and argument, and that it would not command the support of the representatives of a single State in the Union. Promptly, and somewhat excitedly, the knaves began to belabor the fools and beat them into submission. The Call and Examiner were "turued loose" to wrestle with and warn the Government-ownership-men. They were told that the opposition must content itself with opposing—simply that and nothing more. There must not be so much as a suggestion of an alternative plan. Why? Because the knavish portion of the committee knows full well that it is not possible to formulate any other scheme that will at once keep the roads in successful operation and protect the Government from ultimate loss. That position is here asserted boldly, and without fear of its meeting with anything like respectable contradiction. The undoubted fact is that the opposition has no alternative plan and that it cannot think of one that it dare venture to submit to public examination and discussion. It knows it cannot, and that is why it confines itself to the mere stolid act of opposing. It is also why the foolish side of the committee of fifty was so incontinently suppressed. In this great constructive country of ours thinking men will demand something more than mere destruction for destruction's sake. They will desire to conserve what they already have, and to enlarge its scope and usefulness if possible. If the committee of fifty can show how this can be done by some more promising plan than that which they are opposing, well and good, let them put that plan in evidence and give the people whom they are endeavoring to lead, or mislead, an opportunity of seeing what it is like. If they cannot do that, and until they do it, there remains no further occasion or excuse for their engaging the attention of honest, earnest minded men.

It is fitting as well as pleasurable to turn to that much larger and better class of people, who, without guile or malice in their hearts, are intent only upon doing that which may seem wisest and best for the present and future interests of the State. The paramount requirement of California is continuity in the railroad's operations and development. Whatever else happens that must be secured. To suspend or impede those operations by the lengthy litigation which foreclosure proceedings would involve, would be to paralyze every industry in the State. Supposing the litigation ended and the foreclosure complete, what then? Before the Government could take and operate the road, it would have to extinguish the prior lien upon it. That is to say, it would have to pay off the first mortgage bonds. In doing that it would be throwing good money after bad, for there is no doubt but that the whole line could be paralleled for less money than is involved in paying off the first bonds. Further, supposing the litigation ended, and this enormous additional liability incurred, what would the Government come into possession of? Simply a road-bed from Ogden to San Jose, without terminal facilities, or an entrance into this city. It would have no right to the side lines and feeders which bring to the main line the most profitable portion of its business. Clearly this loss would have to be made good somehow. How else could it be made good than by increased fares and freights? All that, be it remembered, in the name and interests of cheaper transportation! With national ownership California's interest in the road would be but insignificant. On a population ratio it would be less than one in fifty. Is it not folly to suppose that the larger interests of the East would yield to the misguided sentiment of California that transportation should be afforded our favored section at less than cost price? To develop railroad business requires singular acuteness and eternal vigilance. Rivals have to be headed off and new country tapped. Does not every man with a head upon his shoulders know that our Government could undertake no such business with any hope of success, and that if it attempted it, the inevitable result would be a fiasco that would put the whole country to shame. With changes of administration frequent, with the spoils system rampant, and with no organized and trained civil service, the Government could not begin to make a success of operating a great trans-continental railroad. Whatever else may be said of the men who control the Central Pacific, it must be conceded that they are capable. It must be admitted also that they are exercising all possible economy. Indeed, the most recent complaint is that they are too parsimonious; which is certainly a singular objection to come from people who want transportation cheapened. Why should the management of the road be taken out of the hands of these capable men whose interests are bonded up with the State? Is it reasonable to expect that we should fare better in the hands of strangers with no interests in California? But Sutro and his men have a grievance and want revenge. They, and their like would ruin what they cannot rule. Every thoughtful man must see that their success would mean the demoralization of almost every industrial interest on this coast. Better, far better will it be to refund the debt, permit the railroad to go on developing the country, and leave to a new and more populous generation the burden of paying for the great road it will inherit.

Talking Through the National Hat. Beyond question the Congress of the United States is the bravest body of men on earth. It is always ready to talk at the drop of the hat—to talk so ferociously that the atmosphere of our national capital has acquired in permanence a gunpowdery smell. Although Congress is elected to legislate for this country only, it scorns to spare itself labor and freely lays down the law for the whole world. Its latest exhibition of this over-time industry is its rebuke to the powers of Europe for not regarding their treaty stipulations with reference to the protection of life and property in Turkey. It is true that the United States is not a party to these treaties and that no American has been injured in Turkey, but all the same, Congress, in its capacity of Universal Regulator, has felt called upon to lecture the effete monarchies and tottering despotisms of the Old World on their duties.

There are no limits to the jurisdiction of Congress. Taking a day off from the customary pastime of twisting the British lion's tail—all being quiet at the moment in Ireland and Venezuela—it resolved itself on Monday last into a Christian assemblage, and went into consideration of the state of the faith in Armenia, the sufferings of its co-religionists there having afflicted its pious soul. The Turks have been slaughtering the Armenians. The assumption is all but universally made that the motive for the slaughter is religious, though for centuries the tolerant Moslems have allowed the Armenians freedom of worship. A clergyman of this city who spent ten years in Armenia as a missionary asserts that religion has nothing to do with the trouble, that the Armenians, a subject race, have grown dangerously independent in the matter of paying taxes, and that the Turks treat them as our Southern negroes are treated when they manifest a desire to get on top, politically and socially. This clergyman was not invited to participate in the recent San Francisco mass meeting which called on mankind to trample on the Turk for trampling on the Armenian. It was known that he had been in Armenia, and did not take the current view of things because of his superior knowledge. In this light we see that the Turk is suffering from misjudgment by reason of the religious prejudice of the Christian world.

But Congress has no time and no inclination to inquire. It costs no more courage to denounce Mahomedans than it does—or did before Utah became a State—to abuse the Mormons. In either case votes result and the favor of heaven is secured.

Given, however, that the received version is true—that the Turks are killing the Armenians in the name of the Prophet, as Christians in their time have killed Malcomme in the name of Christ—and that the European powers are induced by motives of sordid policy to refrain from interference, what is Congress going to do? Suppose the powers tell Congress to mind its own business?

That contingency does not worry Congress. Having spoken in a warlike manner it retires to its tent. If the bluff goes, all right, if not—if warlike talk is returned—Congress has its recourse. It will ignore the rudeness, abstain from making appropriations for armament that might offend the adversary, and seek safe distraction in the discussion of the silver question.

There has been nothing like the recent globe-encircling sympathy of Congress since the time of the Assembly of Revolutionary France. The difference between the two bodies is that the Frenchmen, in their enthusiasm for liberty and the abstract rights of man, sent armies and navies to the aid of the oppressed in whose behalf they passed resolutions of the kind that our Congress is continually grinding out. We satisfy ourselves with words.

Pity for the unfortunate is a noble sentiment. A great nation that should be so unselfish as to make itself the friend and helper of the suffering everywhere would be a special Providence to this wicked world. That is what Congress appears to wish the United States to be. If it is to be really that kind of a good Samaritan among the powers it must be prepared to fight them. Resolutions such as those of Monday, as well as cartels like President Cleveland's Venezuela message, are worse than empty if they are not backed by the power to make them good in war. Otherwise they are foolish, and make the United States ridiculous. That we are not capable of making them good, and cannot be until hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on our navy and coast defenses, everybody who is not a fool is aware. Even the average member of Congress knows it.

Dastardly Speech of Senator Tillman.

In a political way, the most remarkable event of the week is Senator Tillman's grossly personal attack upon President Cleveland. Nothing more disgraceful has occurred at Washington in a long time. The South Carolina demagogue distinguished himself by calling the President a "bull-headed and self-idolatrous man," a "besotted tyrant," and, what is far worse, declared "millions of his countrymen suspect that a President can use his high office for private gain." The latter reference was to the sale of bonds, with the object of maintaining the gold reserve, and was accompanied by remarks of a like character, evidently meant to insinuate that the President had lent himself, from corrupt motives, to what Tillman calls the schemes of the "gold ring" in New York. Secretary Carlisle likewise came in for a share of Tillman's abuse. The great Kentuckian was referred to as a "Judas," a "renegade" and a moral coward. This sort of talk disgusts everybody of good sense and feeling. The course of the President, in financial as in other matters of a public nature, is at all times properly subject to criticism, aimed at the measures and not at the man. But to insinuate or suggest that he is dishonest, is a thing so vile and atrocious that the people must recoil from the calumny in disgust. Whatever may be Cleveland's faults, there cannot be the slightest reason to doubt his patriotism or his integrity. No man who ever filled the Presidential office could in this respect bear a more rigid scrutiny than Grover Cleveland. By attacks of this sort, fellows like Tillman do a vast amount of mischief, not by discrediting the persons whom they abuse, but by disgusting good men with public life. The tendency of such calumnies is to keep the best and most capable men from filling offices of high trust and responsibility, since it is notorious that however pure their motives and honorable their course of action, some blackguard will arise to impeach the one and blacken the other.

Tillman's glaring ignorance of finance is no less conspicuous than his vilely slanderous nature. His recklessly false assertions regarding the silver question are liable to do much mischief, among the class of minds akin to his own. He professed to believe in the existence of a "damnable scheme of robbery," which aims to destroy silver as a money metal; and so forth. He declared, after the fashion of Debs, that this country is fast drifting into a government by injunction, in the interests of monopolies and corporations, and proceeded to denounce the Supreme Court of the United States as corrupt. As a natural conclusion to his long diatribe, the only Tillman prophesied that some day "the millions of men" now "tramping the high ways, begging bread," would march to Washington with rifles in their hands, "to regain the liberties stolen from them or which their representatives have sold." This is the precious fruit of Populism. It will not be the fault of such "leaders" as Tillman if all the forces of unrest, discontent and rebellion break out at some future time in open mutiny against law and order. But as yet, there is no danger of any "wading in gore"—except on paper.

Possibilities Of The New Photography.

When reports began to come from Europe a week or two ago, of the discovery of a method of photographing the interior of a living human body, the average reader was disposed to be exceedingly skeptical as to the truthfulness of the announcement. But it appears to be amply confirmed. Edison has explained the principle of this novel application of radiant energy, by means of which objects that we have been accustomed to call opaque are found to possess a certain translucency. These radiant heat rays, it appears, are produced by an electric current flowing through a vacuum tube, and are themselves invisible. Professor Roentgen, of Vienna, the inventor of the new photography, has succeeded in photographing a living man in such a manner as to show nothing but his skeleton, though it is related that the subject was fully clothed when he sat for the portrait of his bones. It is further reported that a German editor had his skull photographed by the new, mysterious agency, and was so horrified by the appearance of the negative that he broke the plate and would on no account consent to a duplication of the picture. It is not at all surprising that the editor should thus shrink from exposing a representation of his thinking apparatus to the public gaze. The picture may have been to the journalist the first hint that he had ever received of the poverty of his intellectual outfit. But the experiment suggests a host of interesting possibilities. This new photography may accomplish wonders. It may become the fashion to submit preachers, teachers, writers, doctors, lawyers, and professional men generally to the test of the Roentgen camera. The discovery may relegate the pseudo-science of phrenology to oblivion. For why should any credulous person pay a craniological professor to feel bumps, when for less money a photograph of the actual brain substance may be had, with all its convolutions and involutions? Euthusiasts say that doctors will use the Vienna discovery for the exploration of the hidden mysteries of the body, the location of bullets, the diagnosis of internal tumors and other morbid growths. Instead of taking a sharp knife and opening up the abdominal cavity, with a view to inspection of the inside thereof, surgeons will content themselves with a photograph showing more than the most venturesome laparotomy could disclose. There will be less cutting and carving, and more science in the methods of surgery. Of late years the doctors have been pluming themselves on the great advance of their art, as manifested by this bold practice of cutting the patient open to take a look at his interior. This exploratory incisive method was, in truth, an improvement on the old way of guessing, but will soon appear exceedingly crude if the Roentgen method of photography is what it is cracked up to be. And with the new process in full operation, everybody will be able to command, at small cost, a picture of his own skeleton, and so may ascertain how he will look some years after death.

Our Faith is Lukewarm.

For a time it was dreaded in some quarters lest the religious controversy to which some of our daily papers opened their columns for fear of offending the combatants should lead to deplorable public excitement and perhaps riot. But these apprehensive ones did not understand how deeply indifferent to spiritual things this godless city is. A graceless pleasure, to be sure, was evinced in witnessing a free fight in which the coat-tails of parsons and the gowns of priests were wildly mingled, but the sport fatigued when the novelty departed. And the withdrawal of popular interest has obviously affected the contending theologians. Their fiery spirits have cooled, and they fight now with popguns instead of cannon. Exchanges of assurance of distinguished consideration have taken the place of insults which promised to revive the best traditions of the age of faith. A skeptical environment has reduced Father Yorke and Parson Wendte to the cruel necessity of debating like gentlemen. They know that the average reader of the newspapers is at best languidly interested in doctrine, and generally amused at those who pretend to take mediæval creeds seriously. A screed from Colonel Ingersoll would be read by a thousand Californians, not ten of whom could be induced to wade through the best effort of a Yorke or a Wendte, well as both these anachronistic defenders of the faith of the fathers write.

But it is not so everywhere. Thank heaven, true piety survives here and there to put to shame the coldness of the lax. When men and women really believe they act on their belief, and do not exhaust their earnestness in mere words. Contrast the living faith of Crawfordsville, Indiana, with the dead formalism of San Francisco. Mr. William Hays, of Crawfordsville, the telegraph relates, came home the other day and found in his parlor a piano which his wife and daughter had purchased with their savings. "He was enraged," we learn, "and began smashing the piano with an ax, declaring it to be an instrument of the devil." There could be no doubt of the genuineness of the belief of Mr. Hays. Neither, on the other hand, could his wife, who held contrary views as to the relations of music to religion, be accused of want of fidelity to her convictions, for, while the husband was engaged in his part of the controversy and wrecking the piano, Mrs. Hays maintained her faith by striking him with the poker, "fracturing his skull and knocking him insensible." We are informed, further, that the good man is not likely to have another opportunity of testifying his disapproval of pianos, for he is tolerably sure to die.

Contrast this exhibition of stout, practical piety with the lukewarmness of Father Yorke and Brother Wendte, whose faith would once have inspired either with the desire to burn the other at the stake. Now they salute like courteous knights and fall to fighting with nothing more deadly than pens. One Crawfordsville ax, one Crawfordsville poker, is more eloquent of real piety than all the pages of the Examiner and Call which the latitudinarian Wendte and the liberal Yorke have covered with their pale ink. The spirit is not with us. We are a dead community, for which the prayers of Crawfordsville are needed.

The Curves of Philanthropy. It is generally denied to the philanthropist to have his good works fully appreciated during his lifetime. There is Mayor Sutro, for example. His new electric railroad to Sutro's Cliff House has been opened, and a surface examination of its methods of operation would make it appear to the unthinking that it is a strictly business concern, devised to make money, just as if it were owned by a capitalist, instead of a philanthropist. But a closer investigation corrects this view. Coupons come in to mitigate the commercial character of the enterprise. If you ride out on Mr. Sutro's cars and buy a return ticket you are given—freely and without price—two coupons. One of these will admit you to Sutro Heights, hitherto open to the public but now supplied with gatekeepers, who levy ten cents a head on all who have ridden on other cars than those of Mr. Sutro. The second coupon is good for five cents at the door of the Sutro baths. Heretofore, the price to see the wonders thereof has been ten cents. Now it is fifteen to all who arrive on cars not belonging to Mr. Sutro. Thus it will be seen that, by the simple means of raising the rates to the patrons of his competitors, Mr. Sutro makes of the patrons of his own cars a favored class, and gets just as much money at the baths as before, and the receipts at the Heights in addition. These last are clear gain. Of course, if this gain went into Mr. Sutro's pocket to stay there it would look as if he had invented a smart scheme to increase his fortune, which would be all right in a plain business man, if puzzling in a philanthropist. But Mr. Sutro cares nothing for what goes into his pocket. He intends to give to the public, some time, whatever reaches it. He has said so himself, often.

Those who are interested in philanthropy cannot but regret that Mr. Sutro has not extended the coupon system. It would be a boon to the people should every passenger on his cars be permitted to buy as many coupons as he pleases, the said coupons to pass as currency for every thing at Sutroville. Why not a Sutro coupon good for five cents on the price of a drink at Sutro's Cliff House bar? A Sutro coupon for half the price of admission to Sutro's Magic Swing? A Sutro coupon good for a bag of Sutro peanuts? A Sutro coupon good for a look through a Sutro glass at the Sutro sea lions or Sutro's seal rocks? And, finally, why not a coupon privileging the holder to gaze in at a window of the Sutro residence, at stated hours, and see Mr. Sutro engaged in signing deeds of gift of his property to the city of San Francisco? But this last coupon would be too cheap at five cents. Mr. Sutro would be warranted in making the price ten cents.

It may be thought that these suggestions are impertinent—that Mr. Sutro is entirely competent to attend to his own large and imposing business. But it has to be remembered that we are all parties in interest to Mr. Sutro's success. What he makes is to be ours. We have his word for that. Hence, it is the duty of a San Francisco journal to give Mr. Sutro its advice in the public interest. And it is also the manifest duty, in the public interest, of every citizen to ride on Mr. Sutro's Philanthropic Electric Railway, and purchase coupons for Sutro Heights, Sutro Baths, Sutro Magic Swing, Sutro Peanuts, Sutro Seals, and Sutro Drinks. Above all, dimes should be spared for the Ten-Cent Coupon entitling the possessor to behold the Philanthropist deeding away his property to the People. That is a sight which anybody ought to be willing to give a short bit to see.

Leap Year And Its Opportunities. Thackeray remarks, in "Vanity Fair," that "any woman, with fair opportunities, and without an absolute hump, may marry whom she chooses." This wise observation is to be commended to the attention of those of the fair sex who are disposed to wed yet are waiting for suitors. In truth, if women knew their power, there would be no bachelors; at least, none worth marrying. This assumes that all women would marry if they could do so, and the assumption is not one of great violence. Of course, not every woman would embrace the matrimonial state, on general principles purely, but it is safe to say that those who would not prefer conjugality to single-blessedness, if allowed a reasonable range of choice in the selection of a husband, are in a very small minority. On this theory, then, and in view of the fact that this is leap year, it may tend to help the work of the Half Million Club if encouragement be given the diffident daughters of Eve to practice on the weakness of their fellow man. For marriages are not made in heaven, but are of the earth earthy. Yet not for this reason is the matrimonial state to be condemned. Rather the contrary, since the institution is in perfect harmony with nature, and springs from natural rather than spiritual impulses. This is the chief reason why the unsuspecting man is easily captured by the clever woman who understands human nature, and particularly the masculine branch of the subject. What Thackeray had in view, no doubt, was the fact that the sentiment of love, which is the ruling motive of marriage, on one side or the other, if not on both arises almost invariably as a result of propinquity. Given the right sort of material to work with, and it would be as easy for a cunning match-maker to bring about a love affair as for a pigeon-fancier to mate a pair of his birds. It is merely a matter of throwing young people together a great deal, and as much as possible to the exclusion of others; under favorable circumstances as to time and place. Nature does the rest. Beauty in the female is by no means essential. Sympathy is by far the better bait. Thousands of bachelors are aching to find some truly sympathetic soul, capable of appreciating their own sterling merits, most of which are hidden so far below the surface that no man could ever discover them. It is true that a great many men think they cannot afford to marry, but these succumb to the right sort of tackle, just as the shyest old trout may be at last brought to basket by the patient angler. The truly sympathetic woman always says she does not wonder that men are afraid to marry in these times—most women are "so extravagant!" But, as for herself, her wants are very little, and she could be perfectly happy in a neat flat, or a very modest cottage, in the Western Addition, the Mission, or even in Oakland. And so forth. The talk about the superior advantages of boarding, as compared with housekeeping, comes later—some time after the wedding. The wise young woman never talks of the joys of the boarding house or the hotel, while spreading her matrimonial net. She believes in being a help-meet, and is full of the most wonderful plans regarding domestic life. When the summer comes, she will go forth to the seashore or the mountains, if she can afford it, and sometimes if she cannot, although there is excellent hunting in San Francisco the year round. The game at the summer resorts, however, is usually of a richer sort, though it is apt to be shy of capture. As an offset to this wariness, the opportunities of close pursuit are superior where men are merely seeking pleasure and recreation.

It must be confessed that one great difficulty that girls young or not so young, have to contend with, is the sordid desire of many men to marry a fortune. This is for poor girls a difficulty not to be despised, but it may be circumvented, for all that. And yet, in behalf of the many good young women whom nature has not greatly favored, it would be well could there be introduced in this country a peculiar custom of the Babylonians, as related by Herodotus. Once a year in every village there was what may be called an auction, of the maidens of marriageable age. The unmarried men formed a circle, enclosing the girls. First a herald offered the most beautiful of the maidens, and she was assigned to whomsoever would give for the choice the largest sum of money. Then the next in attractiveness would be disposed of, and so on until all the beauties had been sold. Then the most ill-favored would be offered to the man who would agree to wed her for the smallest bonus, and the herald would proceed with the others, in the order of their homeliness, until all had found husbands. The marriage portions of the plain girls were paid out of the premium fund obtained by the bidding for those most fair. It was further provided that if any of the couples thus mated should not, on further acquaintance, agree to the match, a release could be had by forfeit of the money paid or received. And fathers were not allowed to give their daughters in marriage; all had to be subject to the custom described. If our Half Million Club could set some such fashion as this on foot in San Francisco, the population would grow with a celerity that would gratify the most ambitious for her future. Unhappily, under present conditions, many of our eligible young men are so greedy as to seek not only beauty but wealth along with it. Every one of these selfish fellows should be trapped in the campaign of '96, by the methods above outlined, and he condemned to hard labor for life in support of a numerous family. In nine cases out of ten, they would be thus better off, in reality; that is to say, happier, than though they should succeed in marrying money and beauty to boot. This is the year for the girls who are neither rich nor beautiful to do missionary work among these misguided young men, and reclaim them from their selfish lives. Let the young women remember that if they don't marry it's their own fault.

The Alms House Charges. In the communication which the Superintendent of the City and County

Alms House has made to the Board of Health, concerning the charges of "inefficiency, neglect of duty, arbitrary action, financial mismanagement, and religious intolerance," Mr. P. L. Weaver has made a strong defense, and, by the simple and exact reasoning of figures, seems to have proved to those who made the recent charges to Governor Budd that his six years' administration of the Superintendency has been far more successful for the City and County tax-payers' pockets than that of his predecessors. The average daily cost per inmate during Superintendent Keating's administration, taking the six years from 1883 to 1889, was seventeen cents per day. Through a series of important reforms, Mr. Weaver has reduced the daily cost per inmate to seven and one-sixth cents per day. Yet his predecessor had twenty-five per cent. less inmates, on the average, to take care of. Archbishop Riordan's letter, attesting to the religious tolerances of Mr. Weaver's wife, the matron, is included in the document.

The Parity of Doctors. Just now there is considerable discussion in England over the charges of surgeons and medical men to their patients. In the controversy the London Lancet has as usual shown its good judgment. The question involved is the vague and uncertain laws which guide the medical men in their fees. With most there is one rule for the rich and one for the poor, the latter tempered with mercy. If a householder has apparently a good income, the doctor in this country, as well as in England, charges him according to appearances, without for a moment considering the real value of his services. In other words, he makes himself a sort of assessor of the income tax. But while he is speculating upon the income of his monied patient, he always seems to forget that in nine cases out of ten the drain upon the revenue of the property owner is far greater in proportion than that of his neighbor of humbler means. In short, medical men only do themselves an injury, both financially and professionally, in exaggerating for a moment the apparent plebeianity of his victim's—(pardon! patient's)—property. It is far the best policy to consider the actual value of one's medical skill, than to dally over the fatness of his bank book.

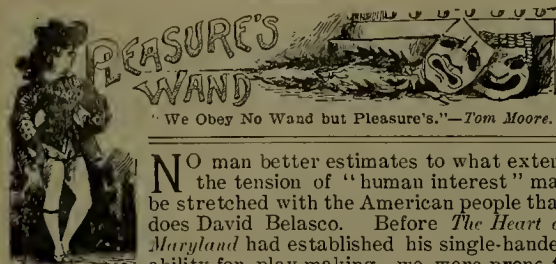

Misuse of a Latin Quotation. The court rooms in this city—all but one—are without staring mottoes to tell you that you will there get all you deserve. But the probate department is fixed differently. It has a Judge who is vainglorious of his presumed honesty, and as if there wasn't room for many honest or learned men in one room, he loves to snub lawyers and show his superiority to men inferior to him in no way, either in learning or honesty. He has lately decorated his canopy with a little original Latin. Fiat justitia ruat cælum, which means: "Let justice be done though a burin fall." It is a travesty on the older maxim, showing the inflexibility of the law: Fiat justitia ruat cælum, which means: "Let justice be done though the heavens fall." When you appear before the Judge, and take a view of the law which he does not, you are apt to get justice as he interprets it, and in getting it you feel as if you had been struck on the head with a burin. Some have thought the Judge's Latin was as bad as his law is sometimes, or that possibly the old maxim was intended. But he deals not in simply old maxims. He deals out new ones, if he wants to, and if you fancy he is mistaken you err. That Judge never makes mistakes—he thinks.

The Armenian Question. A cry has gone up from all Christendom that the Sultan of Turkey be forced to "sheathe his bloody sword and stay the frenzied rage of his fanatical soldiery and subjects." The most Christian nations of Europe weep for the massacred Armenians, but not one of them dare so much as lift a finger against the Sultan. They all despise and hate the unspeakable Turk, but the awful bogie of the "balance of power" stands in the way of action. As for this particular Christian nation, we might help the Armenians if we would, but the Monroe doctrine, you know, forbids us from meddling with European affairs. So the Christian world continues to look on, and the Sultan "sheathes his bloody sword" in a few more of the Armenians from day to day. There is one consolation for the pious Christian everywhere: the Christian Armenians are fast disappearing, and after they are all gone the bloodshed will cease.

Americans Abroad. An idea seems to prevail in this country that every American citizen who gets into trouble abroad, and is put under arrest by the authorities, is entitled to immediate liberation on application of the Government of the United States. Nothing could be more absurd. A foreigner in any country is certainly not entitled to more consideration than a citizen of that country. If the foreigner transgresses the laws, he must take the consequences. The most that his Government can do for him is to see that he receives as fair a trial as the country in which he may be provides for its own citizens, under like circumstances. American citizens who go abroad should understand that their safety and freedom depends upon their good behavior, and that they cannot with impunity violate the laws of any land.

NO man better estimates to what extent the tension of "human interest" may be stretched with the American people than does David Belasco. Before The Heart of Maryland had established his single-handed ability for play-making, we were prone to attribute all semblance of literary flavor and nicety of expression to his co-laborer, and credit Belasco with the skillful adjustment of the crescendos, the impressive climaxes, the deft interventions of the curtain and the general application of that mystifying and indispensable art, stage technic. Belasco, alone, stood for nothing; but, when this cipher followed a unit, the ten-fold multiplication of strength and compactness was conceded. That this, in its way, was as unjust as the placid indifference many Americans have exhibited for Henry Irving's genius as an actor—while unrestricted praise has been lavished on his stage generalship, scenery, and effects—is now undoubted. It is a difficult thing to accurately determine to whom the honors are due in a play written in collaboration, but it is safe to wager that Belasco has contributed a generous half of every piece that bears his name. Like a great many people engaged in the gentle pastime of writing plays to be played by players and supported by the dollars of the amusement-loving public, Mr. Belasco is eccentric enough to turn his attention to works that attract the greatest number of these very vital dollar bearers; and, though adding nothing to the dramatic literature of our age that is destined to be embalmed, he sings a note that finds a thousand echoes in our contemporaneous life, points a moral in a wholesome, decent manner, keeps life in the theatres, and, let us hope, grows moderately rich—a reward as acceptable to the practical mind as garret starvation and a monument from posterity.

De Mille & Belasco's Men and Women is a good example of what constitutes the successful American drama of today. Its story is straight-forward, gradually and evenly developed, and, up to the end of the third act (the last act, necessary as it is, cannot but savor of an anti-climax), full of intense dramatic interest. The great scene of the play is in the third act, where the bank directors hold a midnight meeting in Mr. Cohen's house. There are a few tricks levelled at the gallery that, removed, would add much to the dignity and impressiveness of this otherwise wonderfully constructed act. The picture of the Savior in the Jew's house was a mere bid for a discussion that would be prolific of much gratuitous advertising. It accomplished its purpose. The adjacency of the handcuffs when the guilty cashier gives himself up to the law, and his fastening them upon his own wrists, is another theatric Belasco-incidence that detracts much from the artistic worth of the scene. But despite the over-sensationalism that crops out in places, the story is told in a way that holds the audience for three full hours—a length of time that would kill a play of doubtful merit.

The Frawley Company gives a most creditable performance of Men and Women. The stage settings are admirable, and the stage direction, particularly that of the third act, is beyond improvement. Mr. Arbuckle is not at his best in the role of the cashier. He is an earnest, conscientious actor, but he lacks the emotional quality in its most delicate appreciation that must permeate the part of this remorseful, conscience-tortured man. A strong reinforcement to the Frawley cast is George Osbourne's Israel Cohen, played with a convincing dignity and keen perception of the noble nature of the Jew, who would sacrifice his last possession to save the depositors of the bank. Mr. Osbourne makes the character vivid and life-like; he shows how, even in this wily age, the spirit of integrity and honor may be made beautiful and real. Mr. Frawley is amusing an amazing fund of agility, so much so that I am more than ever inclined to think that there are two T. Daniels—one a living picture on castors, embowelled with a phonograph; the other an impassioned, wildly pulsating young gentleman, such as the assistant cashier of this week. Miss Bates should always be cast in some well-dressed, airy part. She has such a one as Mrs. Delafeld, and makes it delightfully humorous and charming. Miss Kennark's Agnes Rodman is not complete. There is an unaffected sympathy and a grace that are wanting, though the conception is good in many parts. Governor Rodman is the best character work that Mr. King has presented in a long time. Mr. Enos is excellent as the attorney of the bank, and Mr. Bosworth does quite a distinguishing bit of eccentric comedy as Mr. Pendleton. Mr. Leslie, of the staccato ha! ha! and perpetual motion, and Mr. Blakemore, whose sunny speech suggests banjos and mint juleps, are each in happy accord with the respective roles of Sam Delafeld and Colonel Kip. It is very reluctantly that San Francisco says au revoir to the Frawley Company.

The many people that have gone to the Alcazar this week to see A Canting Scoundrel, with its flaming sub-title of Wearing the Livery of Heaven to Serve the Devil, were perhaps happily disappointed to find the play nothing more deadly than Jerome K. Jerome's bright little comedy, The Councillor's Wife, now known in England as The Prude's Progress, with a few slight changes, such as making the councillor a parson and transposing the scene of action to San Francisco. It is no more sensational than is an exegesis by Mr. Bok, though every line that the canting scoundrel utters is attended with breathless interest by the audience in its effort to find some covert meaning of local significance in his speech. Francis Powers did well as the preacher, and Fanny Young was surprisingly breezy and efficient as his wife. It would be amusing to hear what Mr. Jerome and the Playgoers' Club have to say of this recent adaptation and re-naming of Jerome's many-titled comedy.

Rachel Walker, the Creole nightingale, is making a success at the Orpheum that bids fair to rival the Black Patti's triumph in New York. This week she sings the soprano aria from La Traviata, "Coming Through the Rye," and several ballads and songs from the operas. The Orpheum patrons have at once popularized her, and the song and dance gentlemen and the balancing ladies have been relegated to a second place in their esteem. De Bessell does his wonderful modeling in clay, Gilmour & Leonard do an act similar to Gilbert & Goldie's (though not half so clever), the One and a Half make fun enough for three, and a number of good specialties by new and old people fill out the programme.

Though The Editor develops no new melo-dramatic possibilities, but insists rather on rehashing a number of those shiny and time-worn, it has enjoyed a good presentation at Morosco's Grand Opera House this week and crowded the house nightly. Frank B. Hatch was full of life and action in the title role, and the usual good support was given him by the company. For next week, Sins of the Night, a sensational melodrama by Frank Harvey, is announced.

The long heralded Tavery Opera Company will appear at the Baldwin Theatre Monday night in Aida; Tuesday, Carmen; Wednesday matinee, Bohemian Girl; Wednesday night, Hugenots; Thursday, Mignon; Friday, Cavalleria Rusticana and Pagliacci; Saturday matinee, Martha; Saturday night, Lohengrin—surely a series of feasts in which every music lover may find several favorite operas. During the second week of its engagement the company presents Procuress, Tannhauser, Faust, and Lucia, besides several repetitions from the first week.

The Kimball Opera Company, with the "peerless Corinne" and sixty people, said to have special talents for singing, dancing, and merrymaking, will appear at the California on Monday night in the operatic extravaganza, Hendrick Hudson, Jr. The costumes and scenery are all new, as also are said to be the jokes and songs.

When the late School Director, Professor Rosewald, was suddenly stricken by death, he was in a few hours to deliver an illustrated lecture on "Descriptive Characteristic Music," for the benefit of the Students' Loan Fund at the State University. His idea is to be carried out under the auspices of the University faculty, Friday afternoon, Feb. 21st, in the Columbia Theatre, at 3:30 p. m., and by his friends, Messrs. Sidmud Beel, Jaulus, and Coffin, assisted by Miss Morey and Miss Weizel. The object is to establish a "Rosewald Memorial Fund" for the University.

Monday evening will see a new opera at the Tivoli. The Gentle Savage, composed by the late E. J. Darling. The book is written by Estelle Clayton and Nym Crinkle. The full strength of the Tivoli company, including little Gertie Carlisle, will be required for the presentation. New scenery, beautiful costumes, and elaborate accessories, also a Mexican ballet and typical Mexican orchestra, are promised. Der Freischutz is in preparation to follow.

The play for the coming week at the Alcazar is The Arabian Nights, Sydney Grundy's exquisite comedy. It was given here last season by the Frawley Company with great success, and should prove a good attraction in the hands of Mr. Grover and his players.

Next Saturday afternoon begins the new season of Carr-Beel concerts at Golden Gate Hall. Miss Marian Taylor, just returned from Paris, where she has studied with Marchesi, is to be the vocalist.

To the many people who could not secure seats for Men and Women, at the Columbia this week, it will be welcome news that the play is to be continued another week.

R. A. Lucchesi will give a musical recital of some of his recent compositions on Sunday, February 9th, at 3 o'clock, at Beethoven Hall.

"Hear, Ye Faithful, Hear," is the title of a hymn just published for soprano, with violin obligato, by J. H. Rosewald.

A native of New York State, and thirty-four years of age, he is in the prime of youthful manhood, and has made his record at the bar. He is a Mason, a Knight Templar, and a Noble of the Mystic Shrine—and has many friends. In a celebrated legal controversy here once, a powerful and wealthy opponent, a well-known capitalist, did his best to circumvent the young lawyer with offers of gold.

"I never betrayed man, woman or child!" exclaimed the indignant young attorney, with anger. "All the money your client has couldn't buy me!"

The large interests which Mr. Phillips controls in his profession as attorney and counsellor-at-law require the utmost judgment and integrity. He is descended from that famous stock of Massachusetts which begot his great relative, Wendell Phillips.

NOW that the sun has shone once more, it is really pleasant to look back upon the storm, and the amusing way in which it baffled the weather prognosticators. During one of the most violent gales, Forecaster McAdie was heard softly singing the following touching ballad:

I have learned a thing or two, believe
About this gloomy weather,
The clouds no longer me deceive,
Howe'er they bunch together;
I call the turn now with ease,
On valley, or mountain, or main,
So I never hoist up my little black flag,
Until it begins to rain.

When all is gloomy overhead,
And the air oppressively dense,
The mariners then look up to me
For the soundest weather sense;
For I'm full to the muzzle with equine lore,
And I don't tell half I know,
So I never hoist up my little red flag
Until it begins to blow.

The winds may howl and the showers fall
In the roughest way, you see,
And then 'tis whispered around by all,
"He's smart, that McAdie."
But though the mists may clear away,
Along the horizon's line,
Still I never send up my little white flag
Till the sun begins to shine.

A party of bon vivants were discussing in a snug corner of the Bohemian Club this week good things to eat, and things to let alone.

"I must say," declared President Horace Platt, "that tripe à la mode de caen is a favorite dish of mine."

"And of mine," chipped in Edgar Mizner. "I could eat it every day in the week, and never tire of it."

"Tis a French dish, ain't it?" inquired Osgood Hooker.

At this juncture Explorer Jere Lynch joined the group. "We were talking about tripe à la mode de caen, Jere," said Mr. Platt. "What do you think of it. What does it mean, anyhow?"

Mr. Lynch cleared his throat by the portentous cough ere he replied: "Tripe à la mode de camp," he announced, "is so called because it is easily cooked in camp, and many a time and oft have I revelled in it when reclining in my tent on the delta of the Nile."

There was an ominous pause for a moment.

"Perhaps you are right, Jere," said Mr. Foster, who has travelled much himself, "but I confess I was under the impression it took its name from the town of Caen, in France."

"A popular error, Charles," replied Mr. Lynch, gravely; "don't be fooled by it." A large blue fly lit on the case of the Egyptian mummy, as Mr. Lynch lazily lit a cigarette.

In all the churches did the prayers ascend,
"To Robert Ingersoll conversion send;
His stony heart with sharp contrition rend,
Lest he to depths below at last descend."
To which the doughty Robert makes reply:
"Tis just the same, my friends—both you and I
Work in the vineyard as the years go by,
What you affirm, I must fain deny,
But underneath it all the dollars gleam,
The zealot's goal, the stout agnostic's dream."
Belief or disbelief, in either case,
Holds only, sad, indeed, the second place.

The denizens of Mill Valley are confidently awaiting the arrival of Irish thrushes, Cork blackbirds, and English skylarks, which that eminent jurist, Judge Tom Fottrell, has promised them. Sausalito turns up her nose at the pretensions of her rival, and cackles, with a sneer of supreme indifference, "You can have your thrushes and skylarks; seagulls are good enough for us."

There has been fierce combat in the Italian colony again, and Signor Cevasco, the editor of the Voce del Popolo, won a victory over his contemporary, the rival journal. A solemn committee of the six most prominent Italians in the city handed him over the sum of one hundred dollars last Monday, as the result of a bet. The wager involved the accusation by the Italia that the Voce del Popolo did not have correct news from the Abyssian war—which is an all-absorbing theme in the Latin Quarter nowadays. But Cevasco has worked too long in company with the best New York and San Francisco journalists, and he had all along managed to have telegrams from New York and cables from Rome that were genuine—though they cost money. Wednesday he gave a dinner to American and Italian newspapermen. The one hundred dollars he turned over to the benevolent fund of the colony.

The Salvation lassies are not all good looking. There is one of whose face it would be gallant to say "that it would stop a clock."

Oh, grim-eyed daughter of salvation,
Were angels made at all like thee,
Then better far that situation
Where Satan's coals are furnished free.

Better, like Judas to remain,
Upon a fry-pan bound forever,
Than roam with thee Elysian plain
That overlooks the Stygian river.

Under the new régime the Union League Club has taken on a greater popularity than ever. Including as it does some of the foremost men among the Republicans in its membership list—such as ex-President Harrison and William McKinley—the four hundred leading gentlemen in the party in this State who give allegiance to the Union League are typical of the best social, political, and business portion of our city and State. The election of Colonel George Stone, on the first of the year, as President, served to renew the enthusiasm and unity of the organization.

Only a little pimple;
On the tip of my sweetheart's nose,
Only a cunning dimple
Red as the rose that blows;
Only a streak on her downy cheek
Blue as forget-me-not,
But, alas, I know that those signals show
My sweet-heart is fond of the "bot."

Aleck Badlam used to be a great sufferer from rheumatism and many years ago was persuaded to try one of the many springs famous for their mud baths. When he came back rejuvenated his friends congratulated him on his recovery and asked him how he liked the treatment. "Two hundred and forty dollars me boys," smiled the great Assessor, "but I'll never do it again." Mud baths? "Oh no! The next time I get rheumatism I'll manage to sit in a first class sewer in San Francisco for four hours a day. Wouldn't cost anything and the treatment exactly the same."

Charles Rollo Peters occasionally runs up from his Monterey hacienda to pay his respects to the Bohemian owl. He is putting on canvas his impressions of that picturesque coast, and has adorned his studio with rare tapestries and odds and ends picked up in remote quarters in Europe. Over the open fireplace hangs a big iron pot, which Mr. Peters at restful intervals uses for experimenting in Spanish stews.

THE STUFF THAT MAKES YOUNG MANHOOD.

REV. Charles H. Parkhurst, D. D., in The Ladies' Home Journal for February gives some forcible epigrams. He says

I have watched a good many brooding hens, but I never saw one facilitate the hatching process by pecking the shell. The chick on the inside will get out if he is worth it.

More men are injured by having things made easy for them than by having their path beset with difficulties, for it encourages them to stay themselves on circumstances, whereas their supreme reliance needs to be on their own personal stuff.

The less a young man talks about luck and untowardness of circumstances, and the coquettishness of popular favor, and the like, the better for him and for the world to which he owes himself. Every man will have all the power he earns, and the power that he has will tell, not because people like it or like him, but because it is power.

Personal pressure can no more be hooted down, or voted down, or argued out of existence than can the push of the wind or the pull of the moon. If you weigh a ton you will exert a ton's pressure.

There is probably such a thing as genius, although ninety-nine hundredths of it is doubtless the name which lazy people give to results which others have earned by hard work in those hours when the lazy people themselves were either sleeping or wishing they could gain it without toiling for it.

There is faculty enough in almost anybody to become genius if only all that faculty were lumped.

We are more likely to find a good destiny by going afoot than by riding.

The world cares very little for experts, and the course of events is only infinitesimally determined by them.

Sowing still antedates reaping, and the amount sowed determines pretty closely the size of the harvest.

Empty barns in October are the logical sequence of empty furrows in spring. The young man may as well understand that there are no gratuities in this life, and that success is never reached "across lots."

THE "PATE DE FOIE GRAS."

THE first experiment in pâté de foie gras was due to the inspiration of a cook in the service of Marshal de Contades, Governor of Alsace—the same general who lost the battle of Rossbach against Frederic II. of Prussia. This cook, whose name was Clauss, first conceived the high destiny of goose liver in the pastry business. His pâtés met with great success, and when, in 1790, the Marshal left Strasburg, Clauss hastened to marry the widow of a cake baker, and hung out his sign as a fabricant de pâtés. But very soon he found a competitor in the pastry line by the name of Doyen, who had the happy thought of adding Périgord truffles to his liver tarts. It was a stroke of genius which has never been improved upon since. After that this particular industry assumed immense proportions and made the fortunes of several noted families in that line. Strasburg exports annually more than 100,000 pâtés in tureens alone. The canning begins late in October and ends about April 1st. It is claimed that the most delicate livers come from geese that have never laid an egg.

THE brick composition which the Syrians and Egyptians used for their letters was largely composed of aluminum, so modern chemists have decided. In the British Museum may be found numbers of specimens of these light and portable messages of communication. Our modern pure aluminum is derived from a certain clay, and undoubtedly the lightness and durability of these bricks was due to that metal's presence.

One of the most famous men in the United States is Editor Murat Halstead of the Cincinnati Commercial. He is also said to be among the most abstemious, for he never drinks save three times a day—and then just a pony glass of his favorite Old Saratoga whiskey. Claret or wine does not agree with him.

IT is to be hoped now that men have had a practical illustration of how deftly the society women can do the waiter girl in a beer garden they—the men—will give the preference to the upper circles every time when in quest of a glass of the foamy. Society owes a deep debt of gratitude to the effort in their behalf of the charming young matrons of Taylor street. Apropos of which evening, what a very lovely picture Miss Helen Boss made; her clear-cut, refined features and blonde hair being a delight in itself to gaze upon, even without the artistic pose and "setting." As a chocolatier, Miss Bertha Smith was especially "fetching," her slender, graceful figure showing to great advantage in the dress. Men, as a rule, look stiff and self-conscious in tableaux, and the girls-spoiled darling, "Addie," was no exception to the rule; his air of "wish it was over" was decidedly amusing.

One of the prettiest (and most recently made) young matrons of the swim got off rather a good one the other evening at the theatre—quite up to Miss Laura, it was. Seeing a pretty girl not far off with Messrs. Smith and Tompkins in her party, the young matron said to the man next her: "Look at Miss —; poor girl, she is in as bad a fix as John Hays Hammond." "How's that?" was the natural query. "Why, don't you see, she is surrounded by Bores."

The illness of Ed. Greenway was a capital chance for families whose social aspirations are higher than their claims, to get in their work by sending flowers, jellies, and dainties generally, to the sick-room. These people should remember there is no truer aphorism than that "eaten bread is soon forgotten," and the chances are they will be as coldly and calmly ignored in the matter of cards for the cotillion in the future as they have been in the past.

Of all the masks and dominoes at the Burton leap year dance this week none created more stir than the white nun-like one with the hood. She literally seemed to be here, there, and everywhere in an instant, and her familiarity with the officers' affairs was actually startling. Some one set the idea going that it was a former resident at the post—now a divorcée—who had slipped in.

Several funny incidents took place that evening. One young officer whose tender feelings for a pretty bud have not yet found expression in speech, took the opportunity of whispering to a domino strongly resembling the girl in question, that it was not strange that she was such a good player of "Jenkins," for she always knew whose hand had coin in it; and then the young man was utterly dismayed when the unmasking came to find he had made a decided mis-lick. Some of the girls found it very difficult to conceal their identity, even under a mask. Miss Grace Sabine's tall figure was spotted at once, and one of the soldier beaux had a good deal of fun at her expense, they say.

It was a perfect delight to the women to see the old time fashion of giving pretty favors in the cotillion revived by George Newhall at his german on Wednesday evening. But then the dear creatures should remember it is only wealthy young men who can afford to indulge in such trifles.

A GLIMPSE OF THE FOYER DE DANSE, GRAND OPERA.

By HENRY BUELLOW, Illustrated by Edouard Cucuel Paris.

WHEN Oliver Wendell Holmes said that if good Americans died they wanted to go to Paris, he was not so far from the fantastic mark at which all geniuses have shot at with their barbed or blunt arrows into the air. As Longfellow would tell, the poets find them once in a while in the "heart of a tree"—found by a friend.

But when Holmes was in Paris—so many years ago—it was not the Paris of to-day. Longfellow's "Outre Mer" is a romance that is like a bit of faded tapestry, so far as life is concerned—scented with orris and camphor.

However, the good healthy work in French art which first Millet developed and then flung open the gates for freedom in composition and color, did more for men like the great Boulanger, who adorned that marvelous structure of modern times, the Grand Opera House, in the Place de l'Opera, in Paris, than most people, notwithstanding the variance of their style.

The great sculptors added their splendid memorials to the famous composers of France.

A grand ball at the "opera" means everything to the Paris clubman; also to the English and American visitor, and they form a large proportion of the participants.

The swell club in Paris for Americans is the "Cercle Lincoln," of which young Mackay (who was thrown from his horse and killed) was a member, and they always turn out the United States colony in full force when the Grand Opera ball occurs.

But then—alas, they don't as a rule meet the lovely fair ones whom they have adored through lorgnettes! Nay! uay!

It must be remembered that a dansuse is not so very well paid in the grand ballet of the Opera House—but then she has been educated at the nation's expense in the Conservatoire, and perhaps before her graduation she has readily found the golden butter for her pain maigre sometimes, and often Valenciennes lace and diamonds or pearls.

Launched on that turbulent sea, the ballo of the Grand Opera House, in Paris, the young graduate is a mere figurante, but nevertheless she will be more sought after than the cocotte, who rides past the Parc Monceau of a morning.

They say that one girl out of ten in the Grand Opera ballet ever marries—and that then she weds a tailor, as Madame Judic did, "just to save expenses!"

Admission to the presence of the grand ballet in the Opera is magnificently difficult—behind the scenes or anywhere else. Artists, composers, authors, sculptors, and men of fame in newspaperdom may receive the grace which is courtesy and not scant. But beware! The ballerina of the Grand Opera never lets fools rush in where angels fear to tread—unless she finds out first that they may be "angels" in disguise!

The beautiful drawing of Mr. Cucuel represents vividly the Foyer de Danse of the opera. There are various sorts of foyers in the Parisian theatres. With Americans the word "foyer" means the salle d'entrance, or, rather, the space behind the auditorium where the ladies remove their wraps, and where, once and awhile, gentlemen linger between acts. But in Paris there is almost always a swell "green room," after a custom of tradition. I believe the girls in the ballet call theirs a salle d'attente, which means "half reception and half rendezvous."

One of the daintiest is at the Palais Royal, a play house which, to my mind, possesses the most exquisite interior decorations of any other theatre in the world. The grand foyer is adorned by the most famous painters of the days of Louis Quinze and Louis Seize. The actors' reception room is a dream of beauty.

Of course, the Comédie Française has the most famous "green room," and, undoubtedly, its public foyer far excels that of the Opera in the matter of historical association and—by all means—in the sculptor's art.

But for the gilded youth who has had a gilt-edged introduction, whether he be French, English, or American, the Foyer de Danse of the Opera will, as a rule, cost him all his millions of francs as well as a sad heart before he says good-bye to it.

After dinner try Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum. You will find it admirable.

Properly managed, the new Gold Mining Exchange will be of unquestionable benefit to this community in the respect of stamping fraud upon the schemes of charlatans in the business. Every adventurer thinks that he or she has the privilege of posing as full-fledged experts when every other avenue of profit fails, and the lying prospectus built up to trap guileless people with money bespeaks the qualifications of the concoctor for a life cell in the State Penitentiary. Not a few of these miserable swindlers are floating about the city and State at present. Working men and women are being approached and solicited to subscribe for shares in mines where millions can be had simply for the trouble of picking them up. The sooner the Exchange gets to work the better, and in this branch of the business it will have a grand mission to perform. Before investing a dollar in any scheme, the investor approached by outside schemers, male or female, should then and there refer the proposition to the Exchange for information and guidance, and anything it refuses to endorse had better be dropped right away. People who have recently bought into private companies should at once put themselves in communication with the officers of the Exchange, and there is no doubt that they will only be too glad to pass upon matters of the kind in a general way for the protection of the public. From what we can learn, there are some schemers at work in the community who should be brought up with a round turu. The only way to track them is for investors to come forward, and any communication forwarded to this paper will be promptly dealt with in the way of throwing light upon the venture.

Comstock Mining Shares.

The market on Pine street has been exceedingly dull during the week, and that prices are firm is about all that can be said. There is only one man to-day on the street to whom any credit can be given for sustaining the flickering life of the Comstock. Had it not been for the single and comparatively unsustained efforts of Herman Zadig, the Comstock would long ago have dropped into obscurity. There is no use in attempting to deny this proposition in any quarter. Credit must be given where it is fairly due, and in this particular case Zadig is the man who has worked and labored day in and day out to bolster up the fading fortunes of the old lode. If his spirited action could only inspire others to come in and do likewise, what a change would take place in the situation. Instead of that, however, they are quite ready to follow in his lead, content with the dime or two which can be picked on each rally in a stock which he may engineer. Fortune has favored Zadig in his exertions. From time to time some opportune strike has helped him to pull victory from defeat, and in Occidental the latest timely occurrence of an ore body has worked wonders in restoring public confidence in the situation. This property is looking exceptionally well in the 650-level, and while the management are cautious in the reports they issue of the development as work progresses, they express the hope that the mine will yet repay the fidelity of the stockholders, who have stayed by it so pluckily for years past. If the South and North-end managers would only step into the breach and "assist," old times might be confidently expected on the street. Silver King was assessed 25 cents and Andes 15 cents during the week.

This is the way the Amador Republican heads up an editorial denunciatory of a recent incorporation, described as the Jackson Gold Mining and Milling Company, with a capital stock of $750,000, of which twenty-five dollars has been paid. If what our esteemed contemporary says in regard to the intentions of the company is correct, and it must have good reasons for the assertion, the gentlemen who conceived the scheme should be awarded the banner for their unparalleled cheek. It is claimed that two mining locations made by them covering the claim of the subsequent incorporation, covers the entire business location of the main street of the town. "Within the boundaries of these claims," says the Republican, "there is not a foot of vacant ground upon which the locators could claim the shadow of a right to post a notice, much less to search for mineral. Townsite deeds cover the whole territory. * * * Many of the lots have been sold over and over again. Innocent purchasers have intervened, in many cases paying fancy prices for their property. The total value of the property affected will run up into hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is true, one location, the Better Hope, existed anterior to the townsite patent, and there is little doubt, had the locator taken the necessary steps to protect his interests, his right to mine for the precious metal within the limits of his location, would not have been infringed upon by the town site. * * * The purpose is to sell stock to whoever is green enough to buy, and efforts to that end are reported to have already been made in Jackson. * * * This is the wildest kind of wild-catism. Nothing can be more prejudicial to the interests of a mining section than to have such rank schemes flaunted in the face of the public. In protection of the reputation of this community, and in defense of a rich field for legitimate mining operations, we protest against such ventures to work the pockets of the credulous." It is certain, however, that the locators, whoever they are, will lose nothing by their venture in the long run. If they are going to mine, it will take a long and expensive litigation to stop them, and it will be cheaper in the long run to buy off the corporation than to fight it through the courts. It would seem from this view that there is financial possibility in the scheme, mine or no mine. The outcome will be awaited with much interest by the mining element in the community, who might, at first thought, believe the whole matter to be a financial joke.

New York Stocks.

Since our last issue there has been a decided change in the tone of the New York stock market. Prices, however, have not been advanced rapidly, but there has been a steady improvement from day to day. The decline in sterling has checked the exports of gold, which has restored confidence to a large degree. Investors are again entering our market as buyers on a good scale, and all dividend paying stocks are in good demand. The Grangers show a good advance, as well as Reading and Jersey Central; in fact, the entire list shows a substantial improvement. Jersey Central has probably shown the best gain, the improvement during the week being $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Reading Central advanced $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and Manhattan $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Industrials have shown a very light improvement, except the more active. Sugar sold $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. higher. Gas, Tobacco, Distilleries, Leather, and Electric show strength, and prices have greatly improved. The outlook appears most encouraging, and unless some unforeseen accident occurs greater improvement will take place again next week.

A Heavy Mining Suit.

Professor Thomas Price has been lately engaged as expert in the mining suit at Grass Valley, in which Mr. Ford sues the North Star Company for a quarter million of dollars. Professor Price appears for Ford, and his testimony was, as usual, clear and concise on the points at issue. The case is a most difficult one from a mining, as well as a legal standpoint. A magnificent working model, showing the lower workings of the property, shows the former. The ledges throughout the vast territory covered by the North Star operations are all blind, while only a very small extent of the ground is under patent.

Mr. Hammond's Condition.

The veracity of the average press dispatches can now be correctly gauged by the reports from Africa regarding John Hays Hammond. One day he is safe and hearty; the next he is in a pitiable condition. In the meantime one half of the country has been able to make the fact known that they are on the most intimate terms with the distinguished mining engineer. If the truth were known, the majority of the uncalled for interference is from people who have never even had the honor of meeting the gentleman, let alone to possess a speaking acquaintance with him.

W. M. P. SHAW has just returned from attending the annual meeting of the Cortez Mines, Limited, in London.

"Hear the Crier" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you"

THE little town of Haywards has learned the difference between artificial electricity, and the real stuff, as generated in Nature's dynamo. In answer to the prayers of all the worshipping wheat-raisers of the State, the host of heaven, last Sunday afternoon, after the churches were emptied, ranged its legions of storm clouds, and began to get in some pretty fine work in the way of drenching the soil, already drunk from over-much imbibing. It was a holiday, and there didn't seem to be much else to do but to sprinkle the wheat fields. About that time old Lightning himself, who had been quiet for a good many months, awoke to the situation and the fun, and, observing a little structure made for the brewing of the electrical fluid, but unprotected by any of the ordinary safeguards from the aggressive stranger, made for its very heart with its usual thoughtless activity. It was like a giant trying to get into a cradle. It made for the dynamo and the coils and appurtenances, just as the electrician on duty had for a moment stepped into a side room. There was a flash—by no means a flash in a pan—a dash, a crash. When the electrician returned, all the lights in the town had gone out, the machinery was burst wide open, and darkness prevailed. The lightning, that was so fractious that Heaven couldn't keep it under control in its own storage battery, had played the dickens with everything it touched, decamped instantaneously to the deuce only knows where, and left everything in darkness. There's a moral in the thing if you are only smart enough to harness it and keep it for every day use. A part of it is that birds of a feather flock together, and that Lightning, the elder brother, takes kindly to young Electricity by natural affinity, and that if you hold a pipe under Niagara, it will get full immediately, and maybe burst. The people of Haywards, when they repair things, will probably add to their plant a few lightning arresters, and then the next frolic of that kind will doubtless be elsewhere.

THE fact really seems to be that the Truth is mighty, and will get there. A little while ago the Reverend V. Marshal Law got up on his hind legs and barked, because he wanted the Communion service administered in a little less democratic fashion. The Kanakas may eat poi out of the same dish, but that furnished no reason why Christians should drink to each other's everlasting salvation out of the same cup at the Communion. Microbes go to church like other people, and may thoughtlessly partake of the Lord's wine, and even take a bath therein, ready to be rescued by the next participant, and make a landing on his or her upper lip. The Reverend Law reasoned that he didn't care to have the microbe, that sent his wicked sister to hell, with unreasonable partiality and speed send him to heaven, even when he was drinking his wine for God's sake. So the Reverend Law fired away on that theme, but they outvoted him, and hinted that the Lord would look out for his own, and that individual cups were needless. It savored more of science than sentiment. But the truth is mighty, and so forth. The worshippers in the Ross-street Presbyterian Church, in Brooklyn, last Sunday were surprised by their deacons tendering them each a cup at communion. The verdict was universal approval, but with no audible mention of microbes. The ball has started. It is an even wager that the Reverend Law will now say: "I told you so," and will start in on a new campaign. The chances are, then, that before the Reverend Brown gets back into his pulpit again, or Mrs. Mary Abbott Davidson gets out of jail, every good Christian can drink to his soul's health in an individual cup, and that he will drink deep, and possibly a bumper every time. We congratulate the Reverend Law. It seems like a great triumph.

NO wonder the Supreme Court lectures our law-makers. How are they supposed to know whether a legislative act is constitutional when they have never read the Constitution? All the constitutions they know of are their own, and then they generally lose in Sacramento.

THERE is nothing on which the daily press so much prides itself as upon its influence upon the poor, ignorant and humanity that depends upon its teachings for intellectual and moral pabulum. It would be delightful to find a single member of that self-loving guild that has an iota of an idea of the responsibility to which it will be held at the day of judgment. Before we arrive at the stage when we have to be nauseated by its daily nutriment, most of us are taught that to be honest is to be honored, and that to cheat is to be a knave. An unfortunate few grow up without a single idea of morality, and they land in the jails and prisons. It is cowardly and contemptible to teach children to play tricks on a company, as if emity could justify knavery. No man of any sense of decency will accept from a newsboy a ticket that he does not pay for, for he knows he thereby cheats the carrier out of a fare. The newspaper that encourages such tricks is no better than a moral pest, for it benumbs the sense of honesty in the boy and the man alike. Whoever takes a transfer to give a newsboy is a party to the conspiracy, and the man who justifies it will steal your money the first opportunity he gets, on the plea that he believes you have charged too much for that which brought it to you. For Heaven's sake, let us exercise common honesty, and if you wish to fight a big company for any wrong it has done you, fight it like a man, and not like a petty thief.

THE Duke of Marlborough is, evidently, going to be always on hand to make great financial masterstrokes, else why he the descendent of the great Duke, who loved money marvelously. The new Duke's first coup was taking to wife Consuelo, the rich man's daughter, blind to her faults, but shrewdly alive to her virtues—that is, her millions—to get. With the income vouchsafed her by her rich dad, the Duke saw that it was possible to keep Blenheim on its legs, and keep himself and spouse at a decent distance from the poor-house. Now, the Duke has enjoyed his wife and her fortune long enough to be perfectly sure that if she should suddenly quit this sphere, around which the English drum beat is forever heard, and go to dwell among the angels, the income might cease, and he be left in a cold world without consolation or coin, which are much the same thing. His second coup has, accordingly, revealed itself in his consent to an application by Consuelo for a life insurance for $3,000,000, payable to her surviving husband. The premium for this instrument will, of course, he paid out of the Vanderbilt coffers. This, we submit, is a financial masterstroke. It assures all the spoils of his victory, over himself, in descending from the impecunious condition of an English aristocrat to marry a gilded daughter of democracy. If Consuelo dies, she will still live in memory as long as American gold buys flowers for her grave, and sings her requiem.

IT seems perfectly proper for us to keep on the right side of society in our Queen City of the Far West, by letting it know that we have heard that Mr. Ward McAllister Greenway is under the care of the doctors, and faithful as he has long been to all possible accommodations here to the example of his namesake in New York, that he may yet, willy-nilly, still further follow his footsteps and retire permanently from earthly society, and take up his seat at the side of the great white throne, now presumably occupied by the aforesaid Ward. It is fair to presume that anybody who occupies a high seat down below, is not going to put up with a low seat up above, and that the heads of society here are not going to be the tails of society there. But perhaps we are going too far. We beg the learned doctors who are feeding the fires of life in Mr. Greenway to keep up the supply of fuel, and be quick about leading their ward speedily forth into the sunshine. So will society smile and drink his health in his own brand of champagne.

EDITOR Lee Fairchild of St. Helena is learning that one can hardly be a big man in a small town. Fairchild's wit, which is not unfrequently made keen by satire, is getting him into trouble with physicians, mayors, and what-not. He has probably already noted the difference between a town and a city, and that it is the safer to be where people are too numerous to know one another or to care who's who or who is n't.

"BEER will go up," says a contemporary. This must be a new kind of stuff.

A Book of the Week.*

There is no incident associated with the Civil War that is better known than the cruise of the Alabama. From the day that ship "escaped" from Laird's shipbuilding yard at Birkenhead to the day she was sent to the bottom outside Oerbourg, the Alabama occupied the attention of the world as much, perhaps, as any ship that ever sailed the ocean. No matter whether we regard her as a mere rover-of-the-seas or as a duly commissioned man-of-war from a properly established Government, the fact of her world-wide notoriety remains unchallenged, and the interest taken in her whereabouts was only second to the news of a decisive engagement. That she deserved that notoriety the book before us authoritatively proves, and it is for the readers to consider, apart from all political sentiments and viewed coldly as a matter of manliness and honor, whether Captain Semmes and the men under him should, on the authority of this book, go down to history as a lot of freebooting assassins, moderate privateers, or as honorable combatants fighting in a cause they had honestly espoused. And after thirty years of peace Americans can look at this question on its merits, without passion, and unmoved by sectional animosities. They can accept the efforts made by the South to create a fleet of commerce destroyers as a judicious policy on their part to help them in their efforts to raise the blockade by causing the withdrawal of some of our men-of-war from our coast line and sending them in pursuit of the Southern vessels. We must admit, too, that Captain Semmes was right in avoiding our men-of-war as much as possible, for his mission was to get as many of our ships as he could to pursue him, and he could do this best by playing the part of a Flying Dutchman, but giving shot, shell, and the torch for such of our merchantmen as she caught on the high seas. On those points Americans are, we believe, agreed, and they would be placed beyond discussion if this book, written by one of the officers of the ship, had not made an authoritative statement, on one point, that will re-open the question whether or not Captain Semmes was a cowardly butcher or gallant sailor. In fact, if we had not noticed that the book had been written by one of the officers of the ship we would not have read it at all. We would have put it away as superfluous, just as we would put away our A B C's or our numerals. There is nothing new in the book, not a line, but we have authority, and, as far as we remember, we cannot recall an authoritative statement on the Southern side of the most questionable event in the career of the Alabama via the sinking of the Hatteras, and it was to find out how Lieutenant Sinclair would account for that incident that we read the book at all. We wanted to get his side of the Hatteras affair, and this induced us to open the book, and here is what he says:

"It is dark, the enemy being indistinctly seen. * * * The enemy has now come up. She hails us: 'What ship is that?' 'This is Her Britannic Majesty's steamer Petrel' is the reply. * * * Our crew have lock-strings in hand, keeping the guns trained on her, and awaiting the command to fire. The two vessels are so near that conversation in ordinary tones can be easily heard from one to the other. For a time the Hatteras people seem to be consulting. Finally they hailed again. 'If you please, I'll send a boat on board of you,' to which our executive officer replied: 'Certainly, we shall be pleased to receive your boat.' When the boat was half way between the two vessels the signal was given, and the sky and water were lighted up by our broadside. About six broadsides were given by us. The enemy replied irregularly. Then she fired a lee gun, and we heard the quick, sharp hail to surrender, accompanied by the request that our boats be sent to her immediately, as she was sinking. The whole thing had passed so quickly that it seemed to us like a dream."

We have often heard that "everything is fair in love and war," but even in face of this dictum we can fancy the face of many a chivalrous Southerner blush with shame at a confession such as this. The sinking of the Hatteras was not the result of strategy, but it was accomplished by low treachery unauthorized by any code of warfare known to the civilized world. It was not done in the spirit of the gallant South, nor do we believe such baseness ever received the sanction of the leaders of the rebellion. What-ever mistakes the South made, and they were many, we of the North to this day glory in the heroism and manliness with which the South defended its cause, and base treachery, such as marked this act of Captain Semmes, formed no part of the method of the South in its conduct of the war. The Hatteras was lured to destruction after the fashion of the pirate luring the merchantman, and that, too, in the dark, when the treachery was the least likely to be discovered. It is true the author of this book tells us that the Alabama—

"Was a fighting ship, and under no reasonable odds contemplated avoiding battle."

Yes, but how does he sustain his assertion? During the two years the Alabama was afloat she had only two encounters with our men-of-war, and she frequently, and we think wisely, avoided battle when the odds were reasonable on one side or the other. And of those two occasions the Hatteras incident was one, and that cannot be called a battle any more than a knock-down blow that is given, without warning, by a big man to a small boy can be called a prize-fight. And the other occasion was when the Alabama was sent to the bottom by the guns of the Kearsage, and here, indeed, Captain Semmes did something to atone for his cowardly attack on the Hatteras. We could forgive the Alabama for the fifty-seven American merchantmen she destroyed during her two years' cruise, particularly as England paid us $6,750,000 for the damage done, but we find it much harder to forgive the baseness by which she threw the Hatteras off her guard, and this book, written by Lieutenant Sinclair, proves, to our mind, that Captain Semmes did not represent the true chivalry of the South at all. Otherwise the book has no literary merit; it is written in bad English, and the author impresses us as being a man of very limited education.

*"Two Years on the Alabama." By Arthur Sinclair, Lieutenant Confederate Navy. With portraits and illustrations.

"In the Hollow of the Hills," by Bret Harte, proves that that author is a natural story teller. Mr. Harte resembles Dickens in creating for himself the scenes in which his characters live, move, and have their being. The California of Mr. Harte is a land of melodramatic romance, a rogue's paradise, a fairyland of felons, and yet he makes it all so natural that we are half disposed to accept it as the California we know.

If the "Hill Caves of Yucatan" unlocked the mysteries of the Maya stone monuments, and gave the world the key to the history of the early races of Central America, as the discovery of the Rosetta stone unlocked the history of ancient Egypt, the archaeologist world would have rejoiced, but it does not do this, and yet it is a book of absorbing interest, and will be extensively read by scientists.

The London Speaker says that Mr. Grant Allen indulges in futile philosophy, and that his "British Barbarians" is "pretentious, dull, and ludicrously ineffective." The book is, the Speaker says, "an expression of the shallowest pretense of enlightenment." That Mr. Grant Allen deserves all this, and more, few well-balanced minds will deny.

"Matthew Furth," by Ida Lemon, is disappointing. She writes like a novice, and, where she should be funny she is not, and where she should be pathetic she is merely sentimental and maudlin. All this is unpardonable in view of the material she had on hand, the London of Dickens, with its great literary possibilities.

The danger of mob rule is graphically illustrated in "The Paris of Robespierre," when the servants threatened to denounce their employers as foes to the Republic if blackmail was not given to the men of the kitchen.

McClure's Magazine has about fifty portraits of Lincoln. In fact, it has secured all the portraits of that statesman known to exist.

During the year just ended the New York Free Circulating Library circulated 654,451 volumes, an increase of 18,318 over the circulation of the previous year.

OUR CLEVER MEN.

SAN FRANCISCO has so many clever men that it would be an endless task to even enumerate them, but from the mass some are more prominent than others, and it is of a few of these that this article more especially treats. In every branch of art, commerce, agriculture and the learned professions, San Francisco may boast of representative men—in some cases men who have grown with her growth, have seen the rise and fall, and rise again, brought about by fire and financial disaster, of many of her foremost citizens. The passing away of others from this list, such as Ralston, Sharon, Fair, Flood, and O'Brien, those kings of finance whose rapid rise to wealth and power surely entitled them to be classed as "clever," and those philanthropists, George Gibbs, Charles Mayne, and Joseph Eastland. It is of the living, however, that we speak, and can unquestionably cite Lloyd Tevis as the very head and front representative of our clever men, who by his own unaided energy and talent, his daring methods, and above all his indomitable will, has risen to be a power among us. Whether as a financier, a promoter of some vast organization, a holder of securities, or chief of corporations, Mr. Tevis alike is a brilliant, brainy, successful man.

Another able financier is I. W. Hellman, of the Nevada Bank, who although compared with others a newcomer, has already made his influence felt in business circles. Yet another banker of note is P. N. Lilienthal, in that he has risen by his own merit to be the head of one of our great banking institutions, thereby evidencing cleverness of no small degree. Antoine Borel is of a different type than any of the above, being of a strictly conservative method and not a speculator; his great executive ability in managing the large interests of his firm prove him to be a man of much mental power.

Turning to the legal world—although, alas! many of our brightest minds are now gone from this sphere—there still remain a shining galaxy of brilliant men whose cleverness none can dispute, such as Reuben Lloyd, whose quiet and modest demeanor is a cloak for the clever mind within. D. M. Delmas, John Garber, Judge Boalt, and last, though by no means least, our own W. H. L. Barnes, whose mental capacity has never been doubted, and whose brilliant sallies when in repartee with the late Hall McAllister used to delight those who were in court. The paternal mantle has surely fallen upon the shoulders of our District Attorney, Will Barnes, Jr., who, although a young man as judged by the preceding, has already established his claim to being a very clever man. As a man of solid mental gifts, ex-Judge E. W. McKinstry merits place, his learning being recognized in his appointment to the State University. Horace Platt is clever, not only in his profession as a lawyer, but in a drawing-room as a ladies' man.

In the commercial world Claus Spreckels, the sugar king, is a prominent figure; his colossal fortune has been amassed by his own indefatigable industry, and the ability of his son, John D. Spreckels, in guarding those millions, proves him a worthy second to his father. Surely no better exemplar of a clever man exists among us than J. D. Phelan. Although his large fortune came to him by inheritance, his wise and philanthropic use of his millions has gained him hosts of admirers from, as Shakespeare says, all sorts of people, as not only is he clever in business methods, but as a lover and patron of art Mr. Phelan is at the head of our citizens, and socially he is equally popular. Irving Scott is a giant in mind and ability, though not in stature, his keen perception, quick grasp of a situation and energy of purpose making him unequaled in his own line.

In the medical world, beyond all compare Dr. R. Beverly Cole takes front rank for his exceptionally brilliant mind, enriched by contact with the brightest men of other countries as well as his own, extensive reading and deep research. In his profession Dr. Cole is considered an authority; he has gained honors in foreign colleges, and is regarded by savants as a man of the century. A man whose modesty equals his learning (and that is saying a good deal) is Dr. L. C. Lane, whose philanthropy has given San Francisco a medical college unrivaled on this continent. As an exponent of the other school of Hahnemann's founding, unquestionably Dr. John N. Eckel takes the lead. A man of broad views, great experience, constant research, a profound thinker and skillful in diagnosis, Dr. Eckel is one of the cleverest of our clever men. Dr. Henry Gibbons Jr. has already won fame for himself in the footsteps of his gifted father. As a bright scholar and successful practitioner his skill is acknowledged by all, giving him front rank in his profession. In the treatment of nervous ailments Dr. Hirschfelder may be ranked as one of the clever men of the day. In surgery Dr. Paolo de Vecchi has decidedly made his mark. Dr. Barkan and Dr. Hopkins are notably clever in the line of optics, while as a dentist whose wonderful discoveries in his profession and equally wonderful success in practically applying them has made him famous, who can rival in cleverness Dr. W. J. Younger?

The church has so many bright exponents of the Faith once delivered to the saints—in all the different sects—it would be invidious to single out any one, although it is proper to say that Bishop Nichols of the Episcopal form of faith; Archbishop Riordan of the Romish; Rabbi Voorsanger of the Hebrew; Dr. McKenzie of the Presbyterian, and Horatio Stebbins of the Unitarian, are all representative men among us.

Of course these are by no means all our clever men; they are among the most notable as such, and are men of mark in our community.

"THERE are but very few persons who know how to walk upstairs properly," says a well-known physician, as reported in The Scientific American. "Usually a person will tread on the ball of his foot in taking each step, springing himself up to the next step. This is very tiresome and wearing on the muscles of the legs and feet. You should, in walking or climbing stairs, seek for the most equal distribution of the body's weight possible. In walking upstairs your feet should be placed squarely down on the step, heel and all, and then the work should be performed slowly and deliberately. In this way there is no strain upon any particular muscle, but each one is doing its duty in a natural manner. The man who goes upstairs with a springing step you may be sure is no philosopher, or, at least, his reasoning has not been directed to that subject."

NEW YORK is stark, staring mad on the bicycle question. Madison Square Garden, where erstwhile the noble horse was worshipped, is given over now to an exhibition of bicycles, bloomers and fanatics. Can you believe that over thirty thousand people crowded into the Garden the other night, and that last night disappointed crowds clamored for admission? You might make a tour of the bicycle agencies with quite as much edification and less cost. But the bloomer girl is what wins, no doubt. I say what advisedly, for a bloomer woman ceases to deserve the soulful pronouns when she dons unwomanly attire.

Have you heard in San Francisco of the legacy recently bestowed upon Mrs. Frank Daniels, formerly Bessie Sau-sou? A kind uncle in England has left her fifteen pounds a week for life. Is not that a windfall? Daniels' play is so successful at the Casino that his out of New York engagements were necessarily cancelled for many weeks. The Casino management has just made an innovation in the establishment of the Cabaret du Néant, an imitation of the celebrated Parisian resort of the same name. It is a gruesome place, hung with black and adorned with skulls and skeletons, and the convivially inclined dine from coffins held up by trestles. This is all supposed to be very fin de siècle and decadent, and the frequenters of the café are filled with the belief that they are truly defiers of fate and masters of death.

The divine Sarah is here portraying the passion of Izeyl, a Hindoo, and as India is about the only country spared hitherto in the romantic drama, the play is attracting great attention. Bernhardt has grown positively pretty, and there is no longer any occasion for jest on the point of her slenderness, for she is round and symmetrical.

New York surely offers everything just now, from grand opera to variety shows. There is every sort of attraction going on excepting a circus and an old-fashioned minstrel show. It is warm weather, too. The days are bright and sunny, and every one who would complain if it snowed complains now because it does not snow.

Your old California friend, Major Selover, has been very much under the weather, and was confined for a few days to his apartment in the Park Avenue Hotel. Mrs. Walter Crosby, who has been at the Brunswick, is just about leaving for Washington, where she will spend the rest of the winter. Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell Scott Moore will sail on the Campania on the first, and will go at once to London-derry, their future home.

The news of the death of Page Brown was a painful surprise here, where he had many warm friends and where his wife is widely known. Arthur Chalmers and Mrs. Chalmers, who were a part of the San Rafael colony for a few years, are now living in New York. Mr. Chalmers is studying medicine.

The death of good old Tom Maguire has probably been wired to you, but I do not know if the sad story has reached you that he died in absolute want. I am sure that there are hundreds of his old friends who would gladly have helped him had they known the truth, but unfortunately these melancholy histories are rarely known in time. His spare figure, with his kindly face, his white hair and mustache, and his immaculately neat attire, made him a noticeable person in Broadway, and I believe he will be missed.

Harry Widmer's widow, formerly Kate Mayhew, is to be benefited by a performance at Daly's, for which many prominent actors, actresses, and musicians have offered their aid.

Her husband's sudden and untimely death left her quite without resources, and as she is a very popular woman every one is glad to help her on.

Mrs. Willie Brown, as she must still be known, is at Asheville, North Carolina, accompanied by her daughter and her son. Miss Brown is to be married in June to Hugh Fleming, of Erie, Penn., who is young, handsome and rich. He is a Yale man, and was a classmate of Harry Hall, Miss Brown's cousin, at Yale. Mrs. Brown will return to her Madison Avenue home in May in time to make preparations for the wedding.

Mrs. George Crocker is making her presence felt gradually. She has a beautiful home in West Fifty-fourth street, where she is at home on Tuesdays, when many carriages roll up to her distinguished door. She looks simply stunning, and I cannot pay her a higher compliment than permitting myself to drop into slang. Slang, by the way, is very much the fashion since the production of Mr. Townsend's "Chimmie Fadden," and even the daintiest lips now find nothing shocking in saying "Wot 't'ell." It is a veritable revel for the school-boy and girl. Mr. Townsend has much to answer for.

PASSE-PARTOUT.

There was an informal meeting of the Gold Mining Exchange on Wednesday last, at which Walter F. Turnbull presided. After reports of progress from the different departments, the following committees were appointed: Executive Committee—P. T. Dickenson (Chairman), W. R. Smedberg, C. L. Hovey, Louis Glass, J. H. Roberts; Finance Committee—E. C. Godfrey (Chairman), W. K. Flint, C. J. Shuster; Committee on Mines and Mining—John Daggett (Chairman), George R. Wells, J. R. Wilbur, H. D. Ranlett, and B. F. Lacy. The rooms of the Exchange are being fitted up elaborately, and it is expected that, by the middle of next month, everything will be ready to start up business in good shape.

STIRRED up by attorneys, old pensioners could not rest content, but put in pleas for increase. Thus impelled the pension figure shot up to $106,493,890 in 1890, $118,548,960 in 1891 and to $158,155,342 in 1893. The maximum seemed thus to have been reached, for the pension outgo for the fiscal year ending with June, 1895, was but $140,772,161.—February Scribner's.

AN import tax on silver and a tax on exported gold of twenty per cent. ad valorem might equalize matters and enable America to retain some of the precious metal that she produces. Such a law would be quite as feasible as some of the bills to which Congress has devoted so much deliberation.—Truth.

comes to stay

There is more than one food which will cause the body to increase in weight. A free supply of sugar will do this; so will the starchy foods; cream, and some other fats. But to become fleshy, and yet remain in poor health, is not what you want. Cod-liver oil increases the weight because it is a fat-producing food. But it does far more than this. It alters, or changes, the processes of nutrition, restoring the normal functions of the various organs and tissues.

Scott's Emulsion

of Cod-liver Oil with hypophosphites, is pure cod liver in a digested condition. So that when a person gains in weight from taking Scott's Emulsion, it is because of two things: First, the oil has acted as a fat-producing food; and, second, it has restored to the body a healthy condition. Such an improvement is permanent: it comes to stay.

THE LONG ARCTIC NIGHT.

CONSTANTIN Nossioff in his work "Le Tour du Monde," says: "During scientific researches in Nova Zembla I had the sensations and experiences of the long Arctic night. It began November 3d, and ended January 20th. September was pretty comfortable. Then suddenly snow covered the mountains. The Samoyedes, my only companions, put on their winter clothing, the fishing boats set sail for Archangel, the ground froze, the sun lost its warmth and heavy snows fell. Winter had come in earnest. On the day when the sun showed itself for the last time all hands went out of doors to bid it farewell. It remained in sight for half an hour only. For a few days longer there was a morning twilight. Then this faded and gave place to black night. The stars shone the whole twenty-four hours. The huts of the colony were buried under the snow, of which thick whirlwinds filled the air. The wind shook the huts to their foundations. Sometimes for days together the inmates of the different huts could hold no communication with each other, though the huts were side by side. If anyone went out he was seized by the wind and had to be dragged back by means of ropes. In this darkness and desolation the aurora borealis did much to entertain and cheer them. It lasted sometimes for five days in succession, with splendors of color it seems impossible to describe. To enjoy the spectacle I used to remain for hours in a hole in the snow, sheltered from the wind. I have never seen anything more terrible than a tempest during the Polar night. Man feels himself overwhelmed in immensity. When there came a lull in the storm and men ventured out, to breathe the air and purge their lungs of the exhalations of the smoking lamps fed with seal oil. Twilight appeared again in the middle of January, and on the 20th the sun rose above the horizon, while the members of the little colony stood in line facing it and fired a salute. No one had died or been seriously ill, but all had the look of corpses and were feeble as convalescents after a long sickness. Health returned with the appearance of the sun."

WOMEN IN THE WORKSHOP.

IN altogether too many of our commercial and industrial establishments, stores and factories, the men into whose hands is given the power to employ and control girls are not fit, from a moral standpoint, to herd swine. And yet thousands of our young women are allowed to go from their homes to work under the influence of these men and in the atmosphere vitiated by them, says Edward W. Bok in February Ladies' Home Journal. And why? Simply because it is considered more "respectable" to be employed in an office, store or factory, than to be engaged in domestic service. The very word "servant" has a taint about it that the majority of young women dislike, and from which they flee. But what else are they in business establishments than servants, pure and simple? There can be no difference but an imaginary one. That is all. Far less leniency is shown in our business houses to women employees than is shown, as a rule, in our homes to domestic help—infinity less. Mr. Bok further argues that if the mistress would seek to elevate domestic work, to treat servants with greater consideration, and to have the daughters of the family show some active interest and participation in household work, better, more intelligent and more reliable women would be attracted to the kitchens of our homes, and the destructive rush of young girls to work in stores, counting-houses and factories, would be largely checked, and a modern evil to a great extent curtailed.

THE LATEST AND THE BEST BRAND OUT

DEAR EDITH:—The square-necked bodice is the fashion now and it is very popular with young women who are not quite certain of the softness and delicacy in one's shoulders which the décolleté round neck requires.

As for colors everything runs to greens, nowadays. For boudoirs green decorations a la Pompadour are the style, with soft green velvet carpets; emerald and bronze—in fact they run the entire gamut of green—serve for picture frames and bric-a-brac.

The Paris Figaro in remarking of the perfect figure of the beautiful Queen of Serbia, and of her exquisite and stately carriage of her head, attributes it to the fact that Her Majesty has never used a pillow, and that she was trained from girlhood to sleep upon a narrow, hard mattress. This is a fact it would seem among European monarchies. Queen Amelia, wife of Louis Philippe, had the same notions. The late Prince Consort of England underwent similar discipline. In a fashionable female seminary not far from New Haven, Conn., attended by a number of our California girls, I am told that the old fashioned "back-board" of our ancestresses is in full sway. In other words, a young gentlewoman attending this female place of learning is not permitted to acquire a willow stoop.

A sensible matron, the wife of a very wealthy merchant, living in California street, not so very far from the Art Gallery has, to my mind, a far wiser solution of the problem. Every morning, the pretty little daughters go through twenty minutes of Indian club swinging, and in the evening before dinner, they carry, perched on the crown of the head a moderate weight—just for ten minutes only. They have exquisite, graceful figures, and yet their mamma says that she believes in letting her daughters have luxurious beds and soft pillows, and that a comfortable sleep is as necessary to beauty as exercise.

Fans continue to be tiny. The very latest are of white gauze, shirred on each stick and showered with gold spangles. The little Josephine fans of kid or gauze have dainty medallions painted on them.

In gloves, the recent fashion has tended toward pure white, or very light shades for all occasions—an expensive custom for the ordinary purses. Gloves in delicate evening shades are fastened with buttons of Roman pearl. Rose-colored pearls are used on flesh and pale pink opera gloves. The tops of the long wrinkled ball-gloves are slashed at intervals and threaded with inch-wide ribbon exactly the same shade tied in a knot on the outside of the arm.

But for ordinary wear the brown English glove is considered to be in perfect taste. It comes in the finest Suede with heavy black points. For driving or coaching at Burlingame or Del Monte, a pair of soft Suede gloves lined with squirrel, which I saw the other day, must be admirable.

Velvet and fur is still the popular combination. Black Bear is especially in favor now and Blue Fox, Marten, and Thibet are all the vogue also. Theatre wraps of India shawls lined with white-angora are another fashionable vogary. Then there are many mixtures in furs, such as ermine with seal, or seal with chinchilla, chinchilla with sable, Thibet and Persian Lamb. Thibet capes on a yoke of Persian Lamb are, in fact, all the rage, and for evening wear, wraps are lined with white Thibet, ermine, or white or gray fox.

PROF. Snore is a heavy built man of slow movements, whose personal appearance is suggestive of a bear. He is also in charge of the astronomical department. Meeting student Anjerry, the Professor said: "Thomas, do you take any interest in the movements of the heavenly bodies?" "Yes, professor, I like to look at the stars once in awhile." "Well, if you want to observe the movements of the Great Bear, come to my room to-night. I'll be in."—Texas Siftings.

INDIRECTION.—EXCHANGE.

FAIR are the flowers and the children, but their subtle suggestion is fairer;
Rare is the rose hurst of dawn, but the secret that clasps it is rarer;
Sweet the exultance of song, but the strain that precedes it is sweeter
And never was poem yet writ but the meaning ontmastered the meter.

Never a daisy that grows, but a mystery guideth the growing;
Never a river that flows, but a majesty scepters the flowing;
Never a Shakespeare that soared, but a stronger than he did enfold him,
Nor ever a prophet foretells, but a mightier seer hath foretold him.

Back of the canvas that throbs the painter is hinted and hidden;
Into the statue that breathes the soul of the sculptor is hidden;
Under the joy that is felt lie the infinite issues of feeling;
Crowning the glory revealed is the glory that crowns the revealing.

Great are the symbols of being, but that which issymbolized is greater;
Vast the create and beheld, but vaster the inward creator;
Back of the sound broods the silence, back of the gifts stand the giving,
Back of the band that receives thrill the sensitive nerves of receiving.

Space is as nothing to spirit, the deed is outdone by the doing;
The heart of the wooer is warm, but warmer the heart of the wooing;
And up from the pits where these shiver, and up from the heights where those shine,
Twin voices and shadow'd swim starward, and the essence of life is divine.

IN CONCHA PASS.—JOHN N. HILLIARD IN INDIANAPOLIS JOURNAL.

Wind of the west,
Wind of the western plains,
Wind of the gray-girt hills,
Wind of the winding trails—
Blow pure, blow soft, blow sweet
Across the land I love.

Soft is the wind of the west,
And cool, and drenched
In odors lily-sweet,
And soaked in wild perfume
That drips

From dew-drenched lips
Of roses as they sway,
To and fro,
In the soft embrace
Of the passionate
Wind of the west.

Wind of the west,
Wind of the wailing harps,
Of grass and grain,
Wind of odors subtly blent
Within the Occident.

Wind of the wanton plains,
Wind of the winged clouds,
Wind of the grassy sea
Blow pure, blow soft, blow sweet
Across the Concha Pass,
And kiss the wild blooms
On her grave.

A PARTING.—MICHAEL DRAYTON.

Since there's no help, come, let us kiss and part,—
Nay, I have done, you get no more of me;
And I am glad, yea, glad with all my heart,
That thus so cleanly I myself can free:
Shake hands forever, cancel all our vows,
And when we meet at any time again,
Be it not seen in either of our brows
That we one jot of former love retain.
Now at the last gasp of love's latest breath,
When, his pulse failing, Passion speech less lies,
When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
And Innocence is closing up his eyes—
Now if thou would'st, when all have given him over,
From death to life thou might'st him yet recover!

DANCING has come well to the front this week, commencing with Miss Church's little dance on Monday evening; then followed the Burton's leap year domino party in the hop room of the Presidio, and George Newhall's dinner and cotillion, both on Wednesday evening; the Leap Year dance of the Alameda Cotillion Club, on Thursday evening, and the fancy dress cotillion of the Entre Nous Club, at Maple Hall, last night. The postponement of the final dance of the Friday Night Cotillion Club, which was to have taken place last night, until the 17th of April, while a disappointment to some, is not looked upon as an unmixed evil. The week has been a tolerably gay one, and the members think they will enjoy their assembly after the six weeks of enforced quiet of Lent, much more than they would now, and, besides, it will be a pleasure to look forward to all that time.

Mr. Ed. Sheldon was the leader of the last Friday Fortnightly Club's cotillion, kindly coming to their assistance when the illness of Mr. Greenway prevented his keeping that engagement. The next meeting of the club will be their Leap Year dance, when Miss Alice Hobart will be the leader of the cotillion, on the evening of St. Valentine's Day, the 14th of February.

The old residence, 501 Harrison street, which has, in its day, had many very pleasant gatherings within its walls, was again, after a lapse of years, the scene of a charming festivity, when Mr. and Mrs. V. T. Lawrence gave an "at home" last Friday evening. Music, dancing, and a delicious supper were the entertainment provided by them for a large number of guests. Mrs. James Otis's tea on Saturday was another reminiscence of old times, for, although the residence is modern, and that portion of the city (Broadway) newer than the south end, there were many ladies present who belong to the older period of social life in San Francisco, and who are but seldom seen nowadays. The Beaver tea the same afternoon was a largely attended and pleasant affair, and so also was the third and final one of Miss O'Connell's recitals at Mrs. Jewett's, and the novel entertainment of Mesdames Tobin and Jarboe brought the week to a most charming conclusion.

The large salon of the residence on Taylor street was arranged as a beer hall, with innumerable small tables, at which the guests were seated, and, while enjoying their refreshments of beer, cheese, and pretzels, could also enjoy the pretty tableaux which were given upon a stage across the lower end of the room. The "pretty waiter girls" were all becomingly attired in peasant costume, and included the Misses Helen Smith, Jennie Blair, Minnie Houghton, Sallie Maynard, Jennie Catherwood, and Lizzie Carroll. The Misses Flora Dean, Marian Wells, Helen Wagner, and Gertrude Carroll were the flower girls; while Miss Laura Bates provided the smokers with cigars and cigarettes. There were fourteen living pictures shown, all of which met with hearty and well-merited applause, after which there was dancing.

The rival cotillions, as society folk called the Newhall and Burton dances, which came off on Wednesday evening, were each successful in the different lines. Both aimed at novelty (the fad of the hour). Newhall's was on the pattern of the present New York style, a dinner-dance, and Mr. George Newhall received able support from several friends, who gave diners at their respective homes before proceeding to the general rendezvous, the Newhall residence on Van Ness avenue, where the cotillion was danced, led by the host alone. The Monte Wilsons, Mayo Newhalls, Joe Crockett, and Mrs. Newhall, mère, were the dinner givers, and the guests numbered nearly all the young married people of the swim, with a few of the older girls, the beaux being of the "eligible" set. The cotillion was commenced immediately upon the assembling of the guests at the Newhall residence, and was distinguished by the introduction of new figures and costly favors, both importations from Gotham for the affair, and at midnight a recherché supper was served in the large upper room which is a feature of the house. After supper the much feasted guests again gave themselves up to the pleasures of the dance, and it was long past midnight when adieus were said. Five figures were danced in the cotillion: Double Circles, Military Flags, the Snake, The Musical Chair, and The Surprise. The favors for each were statuettes, flags, helmets, bows and arrows, jeweled hearts, musical instruments of all kinds, including tiny pianos, work boxes, sewing machines, and pug dogs in bronze. The genial host was the recipient of hearty congratulations upon the brilliancy of his entertainment, and the general comment was that Greenway had better look to his laurels.

The Burton Leap Year cotillion partook largely of a military flavor, being held in the hop room of the Presidio, which was decorated with flags, crossed sabres, guns, etc., the music furnished by the regimental band, and the beaux nearly all the young officers, who are so popular with the girls. The young buds of the season were ensconced in domino and mask, and much hilarity was the result; many a wild guess being made as to who owned the bright eyes so provokingly peering from the mask. A great deal of taste was displayed in the arrangement of the flirtation corners, which were cozily furnished with lounges, soft cushions, etc. and the lights being all covered with red shades, gave a roseate hue to the scene, which was very becoming. A favorite spot, evidently, from the frequency of the visits paid there, was the brilliantly lighted tent where punch was dispensed. A delicious supper was served at 12 o'clock, after which the young people began the cotillion led by Lieutenant Coffin and Miss Burton. The figures were principally of a military character and the favors suggestive of the occasion, being dolls in dominos, army buttons, silver sabres, and bows and arrows, as surely many a shaft was sent forth and found a resting place at this most delightful affair. Little Miss Kathron Burton and Miss Pearl Sabine distributed the favors, and so happy were the guests it was nearing daylight when final good-nights were said.

A brilliant and successful affair of the past week was the Fancy Dress german given by the Entre Nous Cotillion last evening at the Palace Hotel. Three new and pretty figures of the german were danced: Flags of all Nations and Lanterns, Grecian Cross, and Parisian Star and Circle. The costumes worn were both handsome and elaborate. The following are names of participants and costumes: Miss E. Cudworth, German Peasant; Miss Netta Creighton, Spanish Dancing Girl; Miss Eleanor Croudeane, Night; Miss Anna Papp, Queen Elizabeth; Miss Mae Ludlow, Queen of Butterflies; Miss Maud Haas, Moorish Princess; Miss Emma Prosek, Winter; Miss Lotta Musto, Pierrette; Miss Ala Keenan, Spanish Princess; Miss A. Cousin, Morning Star; Miss Beatrice Hughes, Carmen; Miss Mae Folsom, Bo Peep; Miss Mabel McFadden, Marie Antoinette; Miss Lauretta Cook, Night. Mrs. George D. D. Graham, Fishermaiden; and Mr. Marshall Borel Woodworth, Lord Chancellor; Mr. Wallace Alexander, Louis XVI.; Robert Haight, Pasha; J. H. Wheeler, Matador; O. M. Howard, King Rex, Mardi Gras; J. O. Gautier, Romeo; Fred G. Gautier, Hamlet; Clarence Musto, Henry II.; Gaston Roussey, Matador; Edward J. Bigelow, Henry VIII.; Wm. G. Barr, Egyptian King; Sanford G. Lewald, Don Cesar de Bazan. Led by Sanford G. Lewald, those in the first set were: Mr. Henry Whitley, and Mrs. Geo. D. Graham; Mr. A. H. Neussdorffer and Miss A. Sbarboro; Mr. Fred G. Gautier and Miss Emma Prosek; Edward J. Bigelow and Miss E. Cudworth; Wm. F. Hooke and Miss Mae Folsom; Mr. J. O. Gautier and Miss Jessie Lyon; Wm. G. Barr and Miss Mae Ludlow; Clarence Musto and Miss A. Cousins; Geo. F. Heuer and Miss Beatrice Hughes; Sanford G. Lewald and Miss Gould.

In spite of the exceedingly wet weather that day, Beethoven Hall held a large assemblage on Monday afternoon at the annual meeting of the Philomath Club, where essays were read and songs were sung for their entertainment. In the evening there were numerous theatre parties at the California and the Columbia, followed by suppers. To-day Mrs. Antoine Borel will give a tea at her residence on Stockton street.

Rincon Hill has again this week been asserting itself as an entertainment quarter of the social world, Mrs. Robertson and Miss Spinney on Thursday evening giving an enjoyable musicale at their residence on Hawthorne street, Professors Hoffmeyer and Bettman having charge of the programme was an assurance of its excellence. The concert given at the Christian Association Auditorium on Wednesday evening was for the benefit of the Good Samaritan Mission, and was a success socially, musically, and financially. The first of the Carr-Beel Pops of the new season will be given at Golden Gate Hall on next Saturday afternoon.

San Francisco is not to receive a visit from the Oelrichs in the near future, as their friends had hoped, as they sail for Europe about the middle of March, anticipating an absence abroad of some duration. Mrs. Leland Stanford is coming, though, and will soon be here. Mr. and Mrs. Dan Murphy, Colonel J. G. C. Lee, and Mr. and Mrs. Al. Bouvier have returned from their Eastern visits, glad to be here again. Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Mackay are in New York, having come to the United States with the remains of their late son. Mrs. W. J. Younger is in Paris. Dr. Younger is in Chicago, but is not expected to arrive here until late in February.

A most entertaining concert was the farewell testimonial tendered to Mr. C. T. Wendell, the tenor of the California Quartette, at Odd Fellows' Hall, on Tuesday evening. In addition to solos, duos, and quartettes by the members of the California Quartette, the ladies of the Treble Clef Quartette, John and Mme. Marquardt contributed to a bright and interesting programme. Mr. Wendell has a clear lyric tenor of good quality, which, though not cultivated to any great extent, he uses with admirable effect. Mrs. Beatrice Priest-Fine's singing of Mascagni's "Ave Maria" was an exceptionally enjoyable number.

Weddings are to be a leading feature in the social world next week—the Grant-Pond on Monday, the Goad-Hooker on Wednesday, and the Jarboe-Bull on Thursday. But there will be other festive affairs also, and first among them comes the dance at Lunt's Hall on Tuesday evening, when a Leap Year Cotillion will be given by a number of young ladies who, as the hostesses of the affair, will conduct it in regular leap year fashion.

A week from next Monday, February 10th, at noon, will occur the wedding of Miss Grove Crittenden and Mr. C. A. Windels, at Brighthurst, Ross Valley, the residence of Mrs. George E. Butler. The lady is descended from one of our oldest Kentucky families, and her grandfather was the celebrated lawyer, A. P. Crittenden. Mr. Windels has been connected with the house of Geo. C. Shreve & Co. for many years, and is universally popular. Right Rev. Bishop Nichols will conduct the ceremony.

Mrs. and Miss Meyerdom and Mrs. John Corning of San Francisco registered at the office of the Cairo Sphinx recently. Mrs. Corning, after spending a few weeks at Shepheard's, left on January 31st for the Upper Nile in order to compare the Egyptian sunshine with that of the Golden Gate.

The grand ball of the Cercle Français, which takes place this Saturday evening, will be an event in the French colony. As usual, this year the Union Square Hall will be the scene of its annual elaborate festivities. The beautiful club rooms will be thrown open for the guests.

Next week we are to have a visit from a seion of royalty in the person of Prince Luigi, who comes bither on the Italian frigate Colombo, and who will no doubt be fêted by his countrymen during his stay in San Francisco.

Recently announced engagements include those of Miss Georgie Wightman to Douglas B. Crane; Miss Edith Connor to Rudolph Ver Mehr.

THE friends of that celebrated bruiser, Mr. Corbett, must for a moment have been overwhelmed with confusion when they read that he had got into a real fight and lost his equilibrium in an encounter with an employé in a theatre. It goes to show that it is one thing to fight for glory and fun according to the book of arithmetic, with a crowd to cheer you on, and another to know how to practice the noble art of self-defense in case of a genuine attack. It also shows that Corbett is as far as possible from being a gentleman, or he would not have violated the rules of the theatre with his nasty cigarette smoking, and that he is only a contemptible bully. But why waste clean paper in an attempt to class a slogger? He has posed already too long as a gentleman, and, longing to prove that no brute is more brutal than he can be, he is waiting to defend himself against the victor of the approaching fight in Mexico. If Heaven is good to him it will prick his vanity, and, after his next encounter, will inscribe his name among the inglorious Have Beens.

A GENTLEMAN of considerable color entered a barber shop the other day for the purpose of getting it in the locality contiguous to the neck. He was a Spaniard, next to the sun. The barber mistook him for a negro, and refused to tackle him upon the ground that he handled scissors and not sheep-shears. The Spaniard immediately grew wild, if not a little woolly—to speak figuratively. Now the unshaved has brought a damage suit for $25,000. If he will go to the barber for a shave now it is probable that he would learn something new about the dullness of that tool which often makes a rough man look smooth. This occurred in Southern California, where occurrences are quite frequent.

HOW THE BRITISHERS BUY MINES.

LONDON "Society" tells the following story, which illustrates how the British brother buys mines:

According to Frank M'Laughlin, or Major M'Laughlin, as he is called at home, it is the easiest thing on earth to sell a mine in London for almost any price, providing you have anything to show an expert. The Major has been narrating to his friends in San Francisco the result of his trip to London, undertaken for the purpose of disposing of some mining property. "Of course, the first thing I had to do was to let capital know what I was there for. Then when enquiries commenced, I simply said, 'Gentlemen, I have mining property to sell. If you mean business and want to buy, send your expert out to examine the property and make a report on it; you will know then what you are buying.' A company was organized, an expert examined the property and reported favorably, and a meeting was held to discuss terms.

"Now, Major," said the spokesman, 'we have found that the property may be worth something. What is your price?' 'Two hundred and fifty thousand' I said. 'That is more than we expected to pay. We expected to pay about two hundred. There is not much difference between two hundred and two hundred and fifty. If you drop the fifty, we will take it.' I had expected to get about one hundred thousand dollars for the property; so with a show of reluctance, I agreed to accept the offer. When the papers were made out, I was surprised to learn that they were talking about pounds, and I about dollars; but I was careful not to let my surprise leak, and that way I got one million dollars for the mine." Under these conditions, is it remarkable that Barnato et al. have well lined their capacious pockets?

AN ODORLESS REGION.—In that country once known as the "Great American Desert," embracing a portion of Texas and Arizona, there are no odors. There luscious grapes and many other fruits grow, especially near the cross-timber country, but there is no perfume; wild flowers have no smell, and carcasses of dead animals, which in dry seasons are very plentiful, emit no odor. It was always supposed to be a treeless plain, upon which no plant could grow or breathing thing could live, but a large part of it is now successfully cultivated, and but for the rarity of the atmosphere, causing the peculiarity named, and the mirages, which are even more perfect than in the Desert of Sahara, no one would look upon it as a barren country now. Another singular feature common to the desert land is that objects at a great distance appear greatly magnified. A few scraggy mesquite bushes will look like a noble forest. Stakes driven into the ground will seem like telegraph poles.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

THE accusation of being intollerant which is charged by some American papers against the Germans because the latter refuse to give a place to the Heine memorial, causes amusement among the Teutons. The Volk, Berlin, says that nobody denies Heine's poetic talent; nor is there any animosity against him because he was a Jew; but he threw mud at his country and his people, and the French archives prove that he was secretly paid to do so. One may just as well offer the Greeks a statue in honor of Ephialtes, as the Germans a memorial of Heine.

IN Palestine one could pen a brick epistle, which in the space of a few inches contained as much information as can now be condensed into a sheet of notepaper. Such letters were neither heavy nor bulky, and could be carried in the turban or in the folds of the shirt bosom, just as easy as paper letters are now so carried, with the additional advantage that they were imperishable, as is witnessed by the fact that they are now being read three thousand five hundred years after they were written.

PLATONIC FRIENDSHIP.

I DO not know of a subject more difficult to treat than this, and I confess to great hesitation in approaching it at all, says Annie S. Swan in The Woman at Home. Platonic friendship—that is, a friendship pure and simple, into which no question of sex enters, or any possibility of marriage as its outcome—is believed to be possible by some, and even held to be one of the most satisfying of human relationships. This I could very well believe, only I have never met with a perfect instance of such friendship, though I have seen very many attempts at it. The nearest approach to it I have observed between men and women who have known each other all their days, whose families have been on terms of close intimacy for years, and who feel almost like brothers and sisters, though bound by no tie of blood. There is no doubt that the relations between the sexes have of late years undergone a considerable change, and this is largely owing to the greater freedom accorded to women, who now work side by side with their brothers in almost every field of labor. And out of this greater freedom of action and life has arisen a comradeship which is helpful and stimulating in many ways. But this is a kind of general principle, and when we come to closer quarters, that is, to an intimate friendship between a man or woman, married or unmarried, complications are very apt to arise.

Friendship implies a good deal. It is not a mere acquaintanceship, characterized by a casual interest in the affairs of another, but an intimate relationship, which concerns itself affectionately and constantly with the joys, anxieties, and sorrows of another. It also implies a good deal of personal intercourse at some period, though separation may necessitate that intercourse being continued through the medium of letters. It is exacting and apt to be jealous and exclusive in the ordinary human breast. I am speaking, of course, of the average type of man and woman, very faulty and very human, yet lovable withal. The few paragons who inhabit this earth must necessarily be judged from a different standpoint. Then we have nature to reckon with, and in all my experience and observation of men and things I have never seen a case of so-called Platonic friendship which did not come to some issue fatal to its continuance. I am not afraid to say boldly, though I very well know that I shall be arraigned for it by a host of opponents, that I think it well-nigh, if not utterly, impossible for an average man and woman, unmarried and otherwise unattached, to continue the intimacy involved in the word friendship for any length of time without a change coming over the spirit of their dream. Unfortunately it is too often the case that in only one awakens the desire for that nearer relationship which in the perfect marriage, still possible to the few, gives to friendship its crown. Once awakened, this desire obviously makes the friendship impossible of continuance; its very intimacy is a source of torture, its sympathy and union of taste a mockery. I am of course writing of Platonic friendship as seriously as I would of any other friendship. It has many counterfeits, and some fondly imagine that they are set apart from their fellows by a unique relationship which has nothing at all to distinguish it from ordinary acquaintanceship. I am far from saying that friendship between men and women does not and cannot exist. This would be absurd and untrue. In every walk of life such friendships are to be found; helpful, stimulating, and soul-comforting they are. But I do not hesitate to say that Platonic friendship, involving that close, dear, and constant intercourse which makes all true friendship so sweet and satisfying, is a relationship fraught with danger to the peace of mind of the men and women who essay it.

LOST wealth may be restored by industry, the wreck of health regained by temperance, forgotten knowledge restored by study, alienated friendship smoothed into forgetfulness—even forfeited reputation won by penitence and virtue. But who ever looked upon his vanished hours, recalled his slighted years, stamped them with wisdom, or effaced from heaven's record the fearful blot of wasted time.—Mrs. Sigourney.

THE INDIGNANT SPECTRE.

By STUART W. BOOTH.

NOT a word could it utter—not a particle of its intense indignation could it manifest. It was merely a spectre, if such is the proper name for that which hovers around after that which is material has turned to dust.

The fact that the spectre while in the flesh had been abnormally inspired with its own importance did not have a tendency to make it, now that it was no longer a thing, patient or philosophical. It was simply an indignant spectre, and like most of its kind was unable to proclaim its presence.

Six men sat in the private room of a lawyer's office. They were discussing the will of a dead millionaire. Each face expressed jubilation, and there was in each eye a look of mutual distrust, coupled with a suggestion of individual self-confidence. As one of them read the document it seemed to please them mightily.

The customary "In the name of God, Amen," only caused a slight, derisive laugh, but as the various clauses were read the interest increased. To the ordinary mortal the will would have appeared an ordinary one, but to that little coterie it appeared extraordinary. In fact, they thought it was a very clever piece of work. So it was, from a criminal point of view, and each had contributed in some degree to what they were pleased to call their success.

Of that six, four were heirs and two were lawyers and by substituting certain clauses for others, and by obtaining the signature of the millionaire to a duplicate copy, they had secured his thousands for themselves and to the legal exclusion of many others, whose rights, except for the will, would have been indisputable. When the reading was concluded they congratulated each other and sent the office boy for a couple of bottles of champagne.

"So the old fool got badly left," said the nephew.

"Um!" came from five pairs of closed lips.

And the spectre saw and heard it all. But though it could not speak, it was conscious of a desire to say something, and that something was this:

"This is the end for which I worked, for which I saved. These are the nephews, the 'dear good boys,' who were so solicitous of their uncle's welfare. I would to God—" But the spectral arm was powerless to express its wrath.

"Was it for this I turned a deaf ear to the voice of charity—aye, and the voice of conscience? Was it for this—" but the train of thought broke up at this point, and followed a dozen different trails. Wrecked homes, foreclosed mortgages, graves, orphans, passed in review and the spectre writhed. How he longed to kick over the champagne—bought with money that was once his—but a foot of air is harmless to injure anything so real as champagne.

"Not a tear have I seen since my departure—nothing but gloating over the fact that I was duped. If I could only—" but it couldn't.

"Here's to the old man's ashes," he heard, followed by the tinkling of glasses.

"May they rest in peace"—some more tinkling.

"While we spend his coin"—yet more tinkling.

All this the spectre heard. It had the same effect on it as had the old method of torturing by inserting a red-hot iron into the bowels through a horn tube, to avoid all evidence of the crime.

It tried to make itself heard, but the immaterial lips, though they tried hard to move, were dumb. For half an hour the indignant spectre attempted to impress upon the company the fact of its presence. Finally, crazed with anger and mortification of mind, or that which is akin to it in spectredom, and furious at the fact that, though conscious, it was simply nothing, the spectre wafted itself to another scene. If it didn't waft itself there, it got there somehow.

In a little room in one corner of a flat sat a middle-aged woman. She was industriously sewing, the while humming to herself some well-known ballad. Over the mantel was a picture of a comparatively young man that had been in her possession nearly twenty years. She had not seen that face in life for a long time, but her whole existence had once been centered in its owner. After he had ceased to care for her and had thrown her, as a toy, aside, she withdrew from the world and nursed her grief and shame in obscurity. Treasured in her memory was another picture, that of a babe whose little face, though it saw not a whole year of life, bore a strong resemblance to the face over the mantel.

While engaged with her work the spectre realized that it was in the room watching her. Could it have been seen, it would have been noticed that the face of the spectre was that of the picture on the wall.

Suddenly the singing ceased. The work dropped from the seamstress's hands. She looked over the mantel and her eyes dimmed with tears. Not for many years had memory been so active or so cruel.

A scrap of newspaper lay on the floor. She picked it up and proceeded to wrap it around some dress goods. As she did so, her eye caught a familiar name among the death notices. She turned ashy pale. It was his name.

Going to the mantel she took down the picture, pressed it to her lips, and sitting down at the table, allowed her head to fall on her hands, while she bathed the portrait with her tears.

And of all this the spectre was conscious. Pity, sympathy and love were revived. The space of a score of years was bridged over. It longed to once more clasp the woman who had never ceased to love him, but—he was a spectre, and spectres cannot repair wrongs.

As it noted the anguish of that true heart, the spectre suffered the torments of hell; nay, more, it was in a hell the torments of which even the imagination of Dante or Milton failed to depict.

For the first time it realized the truth. How much more precious appeared that lonely woman, the emblem of fidelity, than all the lucre for love of which she had been discarded, fearing lest his so-called friends would chide him with a plebeian alliance.

Racked with remorse and grief, it longed to kneel before her and plead for that most comforting of all human solaces—forgiveness. But spectres have no power to kneel or plead, and this knowledge added to its torment. It could only realize and suffer but could not relieve itself or be relieved. But it was conscious of an agony that was gradually increasing. Oh, how it longed to groan!

The sobs of the poor woman came slower and slower. She raised her head. Her face wore a look of determination. She went to a cupboard and took out a small vial.

The spectre realized that she placed it by the side of the sewing-machine nearest the lounge. Then she stood facing that picture over the mantel and gazed at it for what seemed to the spectre an hour, but which was less than a minute. Opening a bureau drawer she lifted a little baby's cape. A tear fell on it, and after folding it neatly, she replaced it and knelt by the lounge.

The spectre was conscious of what she was about to do. A burning desire to snatch that vial from where she placed it, ere she rose, consumed the millionaire's shadow. Could it have done so remorse would not have been so bitter, but—spectres can't snatch.

Slowly, and with a peaceful expression on her flushed face, she arose from her knees. Taking the vial from off of the sewing-machine she glanced once more at the picture on the wall and lay down. She took a deep draught of the contents of the vial. A little later bottle and stopper fell from her hand. Her breathing became heavier and slower. After a few minutes a deep groan issued from her lips and the millionaire's victim was beyond the reach of faithlessness and torment.

At the same time the spectre's hell became tenfold more intense than it had ever been before.

The breadth and generosity of the people of California account largely for their readiness always to help those in distress. It is a significant fact that the generous, warm-blooded gentlemen who are accustomed to the use of the J. F. Cutter Whiskey are those who generally are foremost in kindly deeds and acts of public enterprise. Hence it may be observed that the better class of men-about-town are sure to call for J. F. Cutter whiskey, and that they are never content with the assurance that something else which is offered them is "equally as good" or "costing much more." They know the J. F. Cutter by long experience, and will be satisfied with nothing else.

monopoly privileges' of the company, is past finding out. The corporation is on the same basis respecting rights of way as is any other of its kind in the State, and has no roads which it does not use.

The real obstacle to the construction of more railroads in Northern and Central California is not any existing monopoly of privileges, but the rabid anti-railroad sentiment which the greater part of the daily press has been at constant pains to cultivate. There has never been such anti-railroad agitation in Southern California, and, as a result, that section of the State is gridironed with railways, new roads and fresh extensions are constantly being constructed, and the country has made astonishing progress. All this has been accomplished with precisely the same rates of freight and fare as are charged in the northern division of the State, though here there is no overland competitor of the Southern Pacific. The wide awake and enterprising people of Southern California, and particularly those who have made Los Angeles what it is to-day, are nearly all from the East, and largely from New England. They were familiar in their old homes with the railroad charges and the transportation service rendered in populous States, where railroad competition has for a generation or more been close and keen. But these people have never been found arrayed against either the Southern Pacific or the Santa Fé. On the contrary, they have at all times manifested a fair and liberal spirit in their relations with the carriers. They have, of course, profited by railway competition—not in the cutting of rates, for rates have been steadily maintained—but in the incidental advertising of the attractions of Southern California, resulting from the rivalry of the transportation companies for business. Neither of the two great corporations has suffered by the enterprise of the other, but together they have worked to build up and develop the country. And the same spirit of friendliness shown by the people to the overland roads has encouraged the construction of a considerable number of local roads, which have likewise aided in the general development and prosperity. Our San Francisco and Northern California anti-railroad howlers might have their eyes opened, if that be possible, by a visit to Southern California and a study of the marvelous growth and improvement there attained, largely if not chiefly through the efforts of railroad builders. It is self-evident that without railroads Southern California would be nothing. And it is equally clear that a narrow and hostile spirit, exhibited by the people of that section towards railroad builders, would have arrested in its incipency the development of the country, and of its towns and cities.

Professional Secrecy.

A Bill has lately been introduced in the Senate, the tenor of which is that in the courts of the District of Columbia no physician shall be allowed to disclose any information he may have, or learn, regarding his patient while attending him in a professional capacity. Provision is, however, made that the above shall not apply to evidence necessary in criminal cases where the disclosure may be in the interests of justice. This is only right and just. The relations between doctor and patient must be protected to the utmost in the interests of both health and morality. To establish any sort of confidential relations between the two parties it is necessary for the patient to feel that there will never be any abuse of the confidences he places in his medical advisor. Ever since the science of medicine arose from the stage of black magic it has been understood that the strictest secrecy should exist between the one who gives advice and him who asks it, and that no inquisitive persons should ever benefit by others' maladies. It is absolutely necessary for the patient to know that nothing concerning his individual ease will ever be divulged before he feels like seeking medical advice. The secrets that go to the doctor's ears should be as sacred as those that go to the ears of the lawyers and the priest. As the latter is supposed to learn the defects of the soul, so the doctor becomes acquainted with the failings of the body and he demands, before he can effect a cure, that one tells all one knows concerning the case and the causes that led up to it.

To do this necessitates oftentimes confidences which the patient would sooner have unrevealed; and when there arises in his mind the possibility that his physician may mention his case and, unwittingly, his name, either to some brother doctor or to a disheartened patient, his unwillingness to speak out increases. The result is that the doctor does not get to hear the full particulars of the case and the patient either dies or is dismissed, as incurable. Many physicians will probably take umbrage at our words and say that they are unequalled for. But we reiterate that the sacred nature of professional confidences is much overlooked to-day. Members of the medical profession should be among the first to see that a change be brought about in these conditions. From the day on that a young man first enters a medical college he should be taught that in his work, more than in any other, silence is golden. Then, when he enters into practice for himself his patients will intuitively feel that confidence in him will not be misplaced. But for those gentlemen who take pleasure in revealing the secrets that come to their knowledge, we recommend that they be summarily dismissed from a profession which by their methods they bring into disrepute.

The Cheeriest Sign Yet.

There is a volume of gratifying meaning in the bids just made for United States bonds. That the amount required, namely $100,000,000 in gold, should have been bid for five and a half times over, is the most exhilarating piece of news that has come over the wires since the beginning of the panic of '93. Those who can read it aright may well take heart of grace, and go on their way rejoicing that the country is itself again. The cheerful alacrity with which people in almost every State in the Union were prepared to promptly furnish the enormous sum total in gold of $560,000,000, shows (1) that there is abundance of the yellow metal in the country, and (2) that there is every confidence in the Government and in its ability and honest intent to repay it in kind. Such an exhibition of confidence at home was the very thing most needed. It will promptly re-establish our credit abroad, cause all the gold that has left the country to come back again, induce new and vast investments in our industrial enterprises, and, in a marvelously brief period, will give us prosperity throughout all our borders. We say that there was need for just such an exhibition. It was called for to silence the croakers and prophets of evil omen. The fiddling whilst Rome, so to speak, was in danger, has been in the highest degree discreditable to Congress. If that body were in the pay of the country's enemies, it could hardly have done more to weaken the national credit than it has done. The financial sharps of Wall street have also been no small factors in the same behalf. The idea was industriously promulgated that the country was bent upon going to a silver basis, which meant fifty cents on the dollar in payment of all debts, public and private. To that there is now the best of all answers. The people are the answerers and their gold is the conclusive reply. They would not lend it unless they intended to see well to it that the Government repays it in kind. With a large amount of the Government's bonds held at home, honest repayment is assured. That means confidence all around, and restored prosperity. It is a happy consummation.

Ambassador Bayard's Resignation.

The report that Ambassador Bayard had sent his resignation to Washington, conditioned on the action of Congress regarding his recent tariff speech, may or may not be true. But there need be no surprise should he actually resign in case the House of Representatives passes the proposed resolution of censure. Under the circumstances, that would be a dignified and becoming thing to do. An ambassador insulted in such fashion, by the popular branch of his Government, would be amply justified in resigning. But it is to be hoped that a narrow partisanship will not carry the Republican majority of the House into so gross an outrage of good taste and propriety. It is true that Mr. Bayard's criticisms of the Republican tariff policy were exceedingly indiscreet. But, after all, he was expressing only his personal opinion on a matter of political economy. It was the truth of his strictures, rather than his indiscretion as a diplomat, that has provoked the ire of the Republicans.

The Ghost Of The Non-Partisan. The flat failure of the Non-Partisan organization in the last election seems not to have permanently discouraged such indomitable spirits as Stewart Menzies and Frank J. Sullivan, who propose to nominate a Non-Partisan ticket this year if they have to do it all by themselves. Thomas Magee, it appears, contracted a tired feeling when the returns came in the last time, and he flatly refuses to call another Non-Partisan convention. The handful of good people who compose this organization have an excellent purpose in view, which is the extrication of municipal government from party politics. But it does not appear that they are likely to accomplish their design by means of setting up an independent ticket. Public sentiment has not been educated to the point of supporting such a movement. The voters, or at least the majority of them, must be thoroughly convinced of the futility of hoping for good city government, under a partisan system of parcelling out the spoils, before the non-partisan idea can find successful expression in the election of a distinctly non-partisan ticket. In fact, at the last election what the so-called Non-Partisan organization in reality did was to set a bi-partisan ticket before the public. It selected candidates from the nominations made by the regular political organizations, and these it placed on its ticket. But the returns showed that the organization controlled very few votes. It looks as though the good citizens who lead this faithful band had begun at the wrong end of the reform they desire to accomplish. They would do better to maintain a permanent club or association, designed to advocate at all times the ideas of civil service reform and the complete separation of city government from politics. By dint of speeches and contributions to newspapers and other publications, the circulation of pamphlets, and in other ways, the non-partisan idea could be gradually made popular, and ultimately could be strong enough to cope with the force of political parties. Moreover, to be victorious in a campaign for votes, a non-partisan movement should not be engineered by a coterie or cabal, such as that which Magee and Menzies have headed, but should be thoroughly representative of the popular voice. No organization can be popular which is composed of a comparatively few individuals, selected by a number of gentlemen meeting in a private office. It must be open to all sympathizers, and must select its nominees from without the ranks of professional politicians.

Sensational Charge By a Federal Judge. Judge Parker's charge to the jury, in opening the proceedings of the United States Court at Fort Smith, Arkansas, the other day, would have answered admirably for a sensational newspaper editorial. He declared that the number of murders in this country last year was greater than that of all the soldiers in the standing army of the United States at the outbreak of the civil war. He also said that in 1895 the proportion of murderers legally punished was as one to sixty, and one in forty was lynched. The Judge proceeded to score the Appellate courts for granting new trials and setting aside convictions, on purely technical grounds. No doubt there is more or less abuse of technicalities in the courts, and that the law's delays and niceties are often successfully invoked to defeat the ends of justice. But Judge Parker seems to have greatly overstated the causes for dissatisfaction. It would be interesting to learn on what authority the alleged statistics of crime are given, and what the compiler regarded as "murder." If there is any safer or better way to determine, other than by the verdict of a jury, whether or not a given case of homicide is murder, it has not yet been unfolded. Can any sensible person believe that the number of convicted murderers legally punished, by imprisonment or hanging, is in no greater proportion than as one to sixty? The statement is on its face absurd and ridiculous. There would be absolutely no security for life in the United States were the Judge's figures correct. Sensational statements of this sort commonly originated with the newspapers. And, if there is any arithmetical basis for them at all, every charge of murder is probably reckoned as an actual offense of the kind. In this sort of compilation, a conviction of manslaughter, where murder has been charged, is very likely to be set down as a failure of justice. It is to be remembered, too, that many homicides which are murder in the eye of the law are excused by juries reflecting public sentiment. Of such are the murders committed by wronged husbands, or by persons provoked beyond all endurance, or the deliberate killing of an adversary in a duel, or in the rough and ready "fair fight" of the frontier or the mining camps. Americans have much to be ashamed of, in the administration of justice as in the common corruption of politics, but the condition of things is by no means so bad as the pessimists would have the people believe. There are judges whose loose tongues discredit the judiciary quite as much as the occasional failures of justice in those high tribunals where trials of capital offenses against the laws are reviewed.

Newspapers, Preachers, and Criminals. Between the daily newspapers and the ministers, the next generation of criminals is likely to be of extraordinary numbers. The former print all the edifying details of crimes, leaving out no interesting event, until all the little future criminals conclude that if the criminal was bad, yet he was bold and heroic and smart, and that is some palliation, and takes away from the badness of the deed. Then the ministers get around the criminal and convert him to religion, so that, however bad he has been here, he is told that he is sure of getting into good company hereafter—if he repents, which of course he immediately proceeds to do. No more glaring case of the contemptible methods of both need be cited than that of Lloyd Montgomery, a boy who had murdered both his parents and a third person, who was tried and sentenced to the gallows, then had the usual religious experience, and whose expectations of what was going to happen to him, after he should be hung, was recently printed and expanded in the dailies for the world to read. He was sorry and he was going to heaven, and he was going to meet his mother and father. If there is any use in threatening hell to sinners, there is no use in letting people fancy that there is such an easy way of escaping the punishment. With the daily newspapers to make heroes of criminals, and the ministers to promise heaven to murderers, there is going to be very little use in having laws against committing crimes.

Gambling at the State Fair. The Rev. Dille has broken out against the sin of gambling. He expects at this late day and in this place to keep people from betting on horse races at the State Fair, which is held in Sacramento. He has begun his missionary work a little late. It is not election time. The State Fair is a sample of the moral status of the people of the State. It never was much more than a series of races. If you don't want people to bet on horses, Brother Dille, in the first place abolish the State Fair. That means sending gentlemen, and not gamblers and loafers, to the Legislature to make laws for the State. That means sending the whole moral character of the community to the laundry to get whiteued, and straightened out, and stiffened, and polished. You see, Brother Dille, that in undertaking the job you have probably bitten off more than you can chew. But don't faint. It's a big job and a good job, and maybe you'll get tired before you get through with it. The habit of gambling is "powerful strong," and, as a people, we've been a long time at it. But our prayers are with you.

Lord Dunraven. Dunraven has been to this country twice and has gone off in a huff twice. His friends are more discreet than he, for they rub him the right way, and smooth him down, and try to keep him within bounds, but he won't have it. He was beaten in the yacht race. He was beaten in his charges against the owners of the Defeuder. All the English newspapers speak kindly of the way he was treated, and even commend the New York Yacht Club as being generous to him, and say the result of the investigation was what was to be expected. And now comes the Westminster Gazette and says that it cannot be but that "he will set himself right by an ample and graceful apology." It is our belief that if he makes any apology, and even leaves out the "ample" and the "graceful," the New York club will be the most astonished yacht club in this wide, wide world. He'll never do it.

THE MARDI GRAS ENTERTAINMENT.

THE Mardi Gras Ball of the Art Association which takes place on the 18th of this month has had three illustrious predecessors. The first one was held in the old rooms of the Art Association in February 1888 and those who attended will never forget the brilliant decorations and the merry makings. The success of that led to the Grand Opera House entertainment the following year and a year later the one in Odd Fellows' Hall. In order to introduce novelty the Art Association in succeeding years produced Operas acted and sung by amateurs; first, Gipsy Gipsy and then Bluff King Hal. But again this year in their new home they return to the Mardi Gras Bal Masqué, which, on account of the lapse of time, has all the elements of novelty. The Hopkins house offers, in its beauty and the security of home, many advantages over the places in which the other entertainments were held and it promises to be a grand success. It will be recalled that the late Stephen Leach, as the Prince's Jester, read the following lines at the first carnival, which have been attributed to James D. Phelan. They set forth the spirit of the carnival and will bear reproduction now. It is whispered that a well known society and literary man and a member of the University Club, is preparing an address from the throne which will be read next Shrove Tuesday night:

Prince Carnival am I! And reign I will!
 All law I promulgate! All office fill!
 A motley: Still, by precedent I'm right—
 A fool in office is no uncommon sight!
 From tailors old, my line unbroken flows,
 Behold your prince—whose title's in his clothes!
 The safest test, "I know but what I see,"
 Our raiment therefore stamps our quality!
 Let lord and peasant in one concourse blend;
 Man is our jest, and merriment our end!

Here, as in other realms, near or far,
 The rule is—what you make yourselves you are!
 With us the wise don folly, cap and bell,
 Fools hesitate—they fit the part too well.
 O! Be ye wise! Make merry while ye may,
 For joys elective—sorrow has her day;
 The mask too soon, alas! is rudely torn away.

I yield to no one—no, unless it be
 The morning papers and society;
 Society! O, Personage August,
 (To whose decrees we bow, because we must.)
 Proclaim a holiday! Our pinions free
 That we may soar; too long thy minions we,
 Like lackeys, in thy tessellated hall,
 Conventionally chil'd, obeyed thy call.

At bal masqué, your feeble protest's heard;
 But, pardon me, equivocal's your word:
 Indeed, who does not understand is dull
 That "full dress" means the opposite of full!
 And rail at masquerade you coolly dare,
 Oblivious of the mask you daily wear.
 Condemn not then our mask and domino,
 They cover all thou let'st uncovered go.
 But prudery, you say, has prejudice—
 Against concealment? Is it more or less?
 Still, at your bidding, th' Venus here of Milo,
 Who'd drape not, shall incontinently go!
 Her view is wrong, your protégé's is best,
 "True art is nature to advantage dress'd."

Albeit shall go one by mistake who's here,
 He's not your set—Apollo Belvedere:
 Tho' recognized abroad, at home or far
 Our haut ton can't be too particular!
 Come join the revel, would'st thou be inane
 Or let "satiety" usurp thy name?
 Still talk propriety, but wear disguise,
 "Act well your part, there all the honor lies."
 If thou would'st keep above the vulgar rout,
 Obey my mandate—"be thou not found out."

You falsely judge—not merit wins your meed,
 You bravely follow, but let other's lead;
 For art, for music, little do you care—
 Enough to know the Joneses will be there!
 For shame, Society! In silk and lace
 We bring you here, that you may hide your face.

CALIFORNIA may expect another laurel wreath shortly, and, although she has had enough to pull upon her, let her always feel glad of appreciation, which, being a generous thing, is rare in this all too selfish world. The sovereigns of American opera, Mr. Abbey and Mr. Grau, have made an appointment to hear in her repertory entire, Mrs. Alfred Abbey, of San Francisco, whom their maître des répétitions has already listened to from time to time by their instructions. Mrs. Abbey was a Miss Bielache, and belongs to one of the old Spanish families who have made the history of California. She came to New York several months ago, and has been ever since under the tuition of Mrs. Bella Thomas Nichols, having taken an apartment in "The Mystic," where Mrs. Nichols has her studio in order to be near her instructor. Mrs. Nichols is now, after working hard for the position, recognized as the head of the teachers of dramatic singing in New York. Mrs. Abbey is a beautiful woman of a commanding type, and is endowed with great histrionic talent, as well as with a marvelous voice.

Miss Ellen Beach Yaw, of Los Angeles, has been singing in concert in Carnegie Hall during the last week, supported by the Seidl orchestra and the ever fascinating Pol Plançon, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Yaw startles the public by very ambitious flights to F in alt., and her middle voice suffers sadly for the sake of these ventures into the empyrean. Her vocalization is exquisite, however, and she has a pleasing personality. Frank Mayo's beautiful daughter, Eleanor, who, after a year of phenomenal success on the stage in comic opera, married, last April Colonel Elverson, of the Philadelphia Enquirer, is lying very ill at her home in Philadelphia, having been severely injured by a fall from a coach a few months ago. There have been several reports in the infallible dailies of her intention of returning to the stage, but they are utterly unfounded. I saw Mrs. Kittie Sonntag the other day, looking as sweet and fresh as possible and gowned, as usual, in absolutely correct taste. She has been devoting herself to painting for some time, but is now, thanks to the prayers of her friends, allowing herself a little relaxation. Colonel Richard Henry Savage has just brought out a new book, "A Cuban Sweetheart," written in collaboration with Mr. Gunther. His lawsuit with Tennyson Neely still drags on, and the end seems afar off. Mrs. Savage has given three receptions during the month. She is looking wonderfully well, and very much thinner than in the old days. Her daughter, Madame de Carrières, has a new little daughter, who makes the fifth in a family of lovely children. J. C. Stubbs, of the Northern Pacific system, is in town at the Windsor, and Theodore Halliwell, of Fresno, is at the Grand Hotel. Mrs. George Hearst has run over from Washington for a few days, and is at the Waldorf. Hugo Toland arrived yesterday from San Francisco, and is stopping at the Hotel Imperial. He will open at the Garrick on Monday evening, as "Gordon Key," in The Social Highwayman, with the Holland brothers. We are having such superb weather here that we have forgotten that it is winter. The park is thronged daily, although I must say that very few smart traps are seen on the drives. In fact, the smart equipages grow yearly fewer and fewer in Central Park, for some unknown reason. It may be because so many of the actual rich linger at Tuxedo, and Westchester, and Hempstead until so late in the season, only running into town now and then for an opera or ball night. Country life is more than ever fashionable and chic, and many wealthy New Yorkers do not open their town houses at all during the winter, or open them only for rental. For this do people from "outlying provinces" float into town, and try to identify themselves with Gotham life.

C. A. Burgess, the celebrated psychometric reader, who has made a great impression among the spiritualists here, is leaving for California within a few days.

Maxwell Scott Moore will start for California on a short visit next week. Henry Guy Carleton and his charming wife left for Nassau last week, to be absent for three months, with the view of finding absolute rest for the very clever dramatist.

PASSE PARTOUT.

New York, January 30th, 1896.

The Thieving Pocker Box. A new form of vice, doubly dangerous on account of its insidious and alluring nature, is gradually fastening itself upon the community, and already offers fresh temptations to the youth of the city to tread the royal road to ruin. We have reference to the nickel-in-the-slot machine, whereby the habitués of saloons and cigar stands are inveigled out of their small change for the benefit alone of the owner of the pernicious instrument. There is hardly a saloon in the city without one or more of these tempting hell boxes. In fact, they constitute a necessary part of modern bar furniture. In most cases they belong outright to the saloon keeper; sometimes he only participates in the profits by getting a percentage of the money taken in through their means. The machine is so made that the chances of winning are lessened to a minimum. The question naturally arises as to why the police do not interfere in this matter. Some time ago certain machines, by which the player might receive hard cash for his nickels, were prohibited and gradually disappeared; but the ones in use at present are just as bad, and are as depraving in their effects as were the others. All "sure thing" games are forbidden, and the men who run them, when caught, are severely punished. Why, then, should the promoters of this especial and rapidly growing vice be allowed to rake in their illegitimate earnings? They should be placed upon the prohibited list along with tan, faro, three card monte, and shell game outfits, and that suitable punishment be meted out to any one found with one in his possession.

THE suggestion of Adjutant-General Barrett that the one-hundred and fifteen thousand men constituting the National Guard be armed with weapons of approved and modern make is timely and right. The militia of all other nations can be called upon to coöperate with the regular army at short notice. At present ours would be more in need of protection than anything else.

going to school

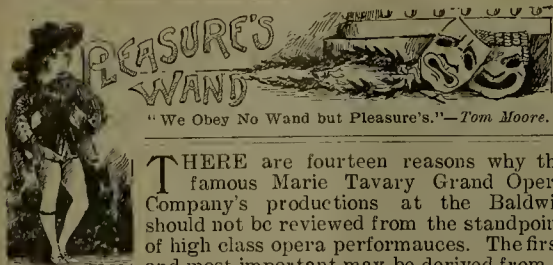

Do the children go to school? And are they joyous and happy? Is school-life a pleasure? And is progress being made? Or is the opposite true? Does the close of each day bring a headache? There is no appetite and sleep is imperfect. The color gradually leaves the cheeks and only a little effort is followed by exhaustion. To continue school means to come to the end of the year with broken health. What is the best thing to do? Take of Cod-liver Oil, with hypophosphites. The cod-liver oil nourishes the body and makes red corpuscles for the blood. The hypophosphites are tonics to the nervous system, giving mental activity during the day and refreshing sleep at night. Don't let your child get thin and worry along. Give Scott's Emulsion; insist on a generous amount of out-door exercise; and the vigor of youth will return.

"We Obey No Wand but Pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

THERE are fourteen reasons why the famous Marie Tavary Grand Opera Company's productions at the Baldwin should not be reviewed from the standpoint of high class opera performances. The first and most important may be derived from a multiplication of the Baldwin's seating capacity by the dollar and a half standard of prices now in operation; which result, even with eight crowded houses a week, would not pay half the salaries of a first-class grand opera organization. The remaining thirteen, as patent to the ear as the first is to the mathematical mind, are, that there are that many first-class artists lacking in the Tavary Company. Madame Tavary was once a wondrous fount of sweet sound (so our ancestors said); Guille, even within the scope of my young memory, wielded a phenomenal tenor; but to-day they are both eventlessly incidental to the procession mediocrity—the placid ghosts of a bygone greatness. Mme. Dorre is an intensely vehement actress; she has a strong, dramatic, mezzo-soprano, and though its tones are not over plastic, nor radiant with color, she sings and acts with such febrile impulse and force that one cannot but admire the one possessor of gingery action in the company, even if the enlivening source seems to be more muscular than temperamental. Sig. Abramhoff has an evenly proportioned basso, profound, rugged and well controlled, and more remarkable than all, he sings unerringly in key—a feat of eccentricity that cannot be too highly commended in the bass voice. And Max Eugene sings a warm, melodious barytone. But there are no stars that dazzle; no voices that wring a pent huzza! from unguarded lips nor make wives and maids hurl rich flowers from the boxes. They give us the operas earnestly, laboriously, and to the utmost of their skill; and loving the dear old immortal operas as we do, and getting them so unoften, we lay aside our provincial hypercriticism and extend a munificent, even if not a zealously applauding hand. Then, with a groan and a sigh, we think what might come to us from New York had we but the angel philanthropist to erect an opera house.

Scenic environment is as vital to a complete appreciation of Aida as it is to Wagner's great music dramas. The limitations of the Baldwin stage precluded any possibility of spectacular effect on a grand scale, even had the scenery and costumes been secured by the lavish hand of an Irving—of which, accessories, in justice to the modesty of the organization, it is timely to say that they were but subordinate considerations. There were enough soldiers to go round, but not enough to stand still, so a hunch of sturdy fellows made half a dozen pilgrimages in and out the wings under the leadership of a doughty looking Egyptian, to whom, after his third recurrence, a generous burst of applause was instigated by some irrepressible veteran of the old California Theatre days (when the custom was to hilariously salute the quaking super whose duty it was to light the footlights) and seconded and sustained with a degree of unanimity and flippant pertinacity that told plainer than did the multitude of strange faces that the usual starchy first nighters were not in their accustomed chairs.

Madame Tavary was not an ocular delight as Aida. Her robust legs and arms were suggestive of Jaeger flannels, and the reddish blonde wig over Aida's dusky face brought to my mind the red-headed hero of The Prisoner of Zenda, whose ancestor had been more ardent than discreet. Her voice still retains a comfortable elasticity, but the limpid sweetness of youth has been outlined by vigorous lungs. Dorre's Amneris lacked repose, as it also lacked the rich cello tones that are inseparable from the role. Eugene's Ethiopian King and Abramhoff's High Priest were the two most acceptable renditions. Payue Clark sang Radames in a way that would have disgraced the Tivoli. Asthmatic intonation echoed from the nose, execratic enunciation, and the activity of a messenger boy made the part absolutely farcical. The choruses were good, and the orchestra, with the exception of the brass on the stage in the second act, under a fair discipline.

Carmen, of all the operas, should not drag. Yet it did drag itself into deadly dullness at the Baldwin Tuesday night despite the compelling interest of its abnormally fleshy story, the absolute genius and originality of its sultry music, and the fierce, demoniacal energy that characterizes Dorre's impersonation of Carmen. Dorre gave us her burning cigarette girl long before Olga Nethersole undertook what Allen Dale terms the "Vesuvian episode." It is her strongest part, and though offensively theatric in several scenes, and devoid of the flashes of womanly tenderness that are necessary to complete the perspective, it is a comparatively clever piece of acting, and the only redeeming point in the entire performance. Dorre's voice adapts itself much better to Carmen than to Amneris, as the sympathetic quality which it lacks is not so essential as the ring and dramatic delivery that are her salient endowments. She sang the "Avanera" and the "Seguedilla" with admirable spirit, and made the death scene impressively tragic. Eugene was disappointing as the Toreador, particularly so after the good work he did in Aida. Payne's Don Jose duplicated his failure of Monday night.

Compared with the performances of Aida and Carmen, Les Huguenots given on Wednesday night displayed the Tavary Company in an astonishingly felicitous task. The first three acts were fairly done, but the last act surpassed anything that these singers have ever undertaken in San Francisco. Guille, for once, was in good voice at the propitious hour, and sang Raul Nangis with a tone and ardor that almost brought back his great days with Patti. Mme. Tavary sang with less effort and more effect, and helped bravely to make the famous closing scene vividly dramatic and artistic. Mme. Tomlins displayed a sympathetic contralto, with excellent middle tones, in the page's part. Mlle. Lichter gave an agreeable though not brilliant rendition of the Queen, and Eugene's barytone invested de Nevers with even, tuneful grace. Abramhoff, in his opening aria, was vague and uncertain on the deep notes, which seemed to be beneath the compass of his voice, but otherwise his Marsel was a potent factor in the general success of the opera. The choruses and orchestra were in good accord and balance.

Hendrick Hudson, Jr., defined with a generous breadth of ambiguity as a musical extravaganza, has the usual absence of plot and meaning that distinguishes the spectacular farce, the accustomed coterie of sinuous maidens and comic gentlemen, and the inevitable jokes and songs that go to make up the mirth and melody of these evanescent butterfly shows. Corinne is, of course, the central figure throughout, and now grown to the realization and maturity of womanhood, she no longer asks odds as a precocious child prodigy, but acts, sings, and dances with an indefatigable vim and animation that justifies her prominence in the cast. She wears enough jewels in one scene to pale the electric lights, and make the blazing shirt bosom of the box-office clerk appear a dreary desert by comparison. But rarer than all her precious stones and gorgeous costumes are the two exquisitely tapered legs, rapturously embraced by her silken tights. Corinne always had a wealth of legs, even when it was in bud, but now, in the full blossom of swelling contour, she would warm the heart of a bronze Schopenhauer. And there are others, too—about twenty pair, but they are monotonously stocky beside Corinne's.

The Gentle Savage, while crude in many parts, has enough good things in it to make a bright clever piece of American satire. Some of the lyrics are quite tuneful, and, though developing nothing startlingly original in the melodic line, they are gracefully treated and quite in the spirit of the piece. The Tivoli company gives a good performance of the comedy, Hartman being particularly happy in the character of Howling Swell.

The Gentle Savage has taken so well at the Tivoli that it will be continued another week.

That San Francisco always has a glad, hearty land for her old time minstrel favorites, has been bountifully manifested at the Orpheum this week, where Carroll Johnson is the star attraction. Besides Johnson's inimitable songs and dances, Billy Carter, the banjoist and comedian, and Rachel Walker, the Creole soprano, are happy features of a good specialty bill.

At the Alcazar, this week, the attraction has been Sydney Grundy's The Arabian Nights, a delicious comedy gem, followed by Joe's Girls, a howling farce of the most laughable character. Hereward Hoyt made an amusing Hummingtop, and May Noble did fairly well with the gutta percha girl. In fact, the casts of both pieces were in good hands.

...

The great and only Paderewski plays at the California on Monday night to what promises to be the most brilliant audience seen here in years. The remaining two recitals are to be given on Wednesday and Friday. Apropos of Paderewski, here is a clever bit of verse by Edward S. Creamer in the Sun:

When Paderewski plays, each separate hair
Of his fine head becomes a wondrous plant
Of power electrical, and this the fair,
Sweet portion of humanity doth much enchant.
And then the magic of his fingers fine,
When he strikes notes that fluctuate the soul,
When appetite lusts not for earthly wine,
But feasts on nectar in the player's control,
Nor can we doubt the story of a day,
Of two young women present, lovely-faced,
Who, being overcome as he did play,
Forgot themselves, and each the other embraced.
E'en men have yielded to his glorious powers,
And, 'neath the spell, have bought their wives rich flowers.

The usual meal of a sword swallower on exhibition at the London Aquarium consists of twenty-one inches of cavalry sabre, a bayonet weighted with two eighteen-pound dumbbells, and fourteen small swords. During digestion a watch can be heard ticking in this gentleman's corrugated inside. This hardly allows room for the proverbial pinch of salt, but it proves that the man's gullet compares in capacity favorably with that of any of our own citizens who feast off the promises of political aspirants.

Patti, the sweet-voiced, is still captivating the hearts of the gay Parisians. At an entertainment given by her in that city a week or so ago, all the tickets were easily disposed of, the haut monde taking the most expensive as soon as they were placed on the market. A "farewell" trip to this city is a possibility.

Thomas Keene, the tragedian, will commence his annual engagement at the California on Tuesday evening, presenting Louis XI., in which he has achieved great success. Wednesday night, Richard III.; Thursday, Richelieu; Friday, Hamlet; Saturday matinee, Othello; Saturday night, Louis XI., again, and Sunday, Richard III.

The following is the repertory of the Tavery Company for next week at the Baldwin: Monday, Lucia and Cavalleria Rusticana; Tuesday, Mignon; Wednesday matinee, Martha; Wednesday night, Aida; Thursday, Carmen; Friday, Faust; Saturday matinee, Travatore, and Saturday night, Lohengrin.

Sins of the Night, one of the multitude of melodramas written by Frank Harvey, has delighted the patrons of the Grand this week. On Monday Bartley Campbell's great American drama, My Partner, magnificently staged and appointed, will take the boards.

The Kimball Comic Opera Company, headed by Corinne, will be transposed to the Columbia next Monday, where, no doubt, it will duplicate the excellent business it has done at the California during this week.

The Alcazar will present Bartley Campbell's ever popular The White Slave next week, with the full strength of the company now playing there.

This afternoon's Carr-Beel concert offers a programme of exceptional interest to lovers of the best that there is in music.

SAY, girls, what a nice time we are going to have, now that the pampered Paderewski—whose name none of you can pronounce properly—is going to bring his frizzled and high aspiring locks among us, and is going to scatter his brilliant flashes of musical light to dispel the overwhelming darkness in which are enveloped our ideas of fugue and counterpoint and harmony, of nocturne and sonata and concerto. Every new musician that appears is far and away superior to every one that ever was. Every new pianist, that looms above our far Western horizon, shines with more brilliant light and flashes with more dazzling coruscations than any astral pianist that was ever called a star in the musical firmament. So, hail and welcome, Paderewski! Know that before you touch a key of the piano, our San Francisco audiences have crowned you King of pianists. Where are Thalberg, and Liszt, and Jael, and Gottschalk, and Rubenstein, and d'Albert, now that you are here? Dead as door nails. Where would they be, if they were present, compared with you, O incomparable Paderewski, hair and all? Absolutely nowhere, utterly invisible behind the far-spreading, impenetrable, deep-tangled wild-wood of capillary forest, under which your genius scintillates. We pin our faith to you, lovely pianist, before whom all women weep, and whom all women adore. You come among us to play the piano for your bread and butter, at prices which will enable you to pack off loads of everything for sale at the bakery. Orpheus played and the stone walls that had ears took up the merry dance. You will touch the keys, and we who think music is more than meat and drink, will thrust upon you our hoarded dollars, and bless you for taking the bread and cake from our mouths. For, great heavens, who among us will dare to say she has not heard the divine Paderewski?

Just on the threshold of the heavenly portals
Saint Peter sat, and gazed below on mortals.
He saw Armenian massacred by Turk,
And murmured, "This, indeed, is bloody work."
He saw the Cuban and the Spaniard war,
Fitzsimmons scrap with doughty Peter Maher.
But naught of these did the good Saint excite,
Till San Francisco slowly wheeled in sight.
Then did Saint Peter raise his keys on high,
And his hoarse accents echoed through the sky,
"What," said a Cherubim, "do you intend To drop those keys, my venerable friend?"
"Aye, that I do," the wrathful saint replied;
"Keep back, young fellow, I'll not be denied;
Those controversialists must give us peace,
With death alone their wranglings may cease."
Down came the massive hunch, and mercy sakes,
The doctrine-splitters flattened out like cakes.

When little Reinstein was first chosen to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the University of California a couple of months or so ago, the heart of every alumnus throbbed three beats to the second faster than usual, for he was a little leaven of the Native Sons and was quite capable of leavening the whole lump. He loved his Alma Mater. He was one of its early offspring. He has watched the multitudinous yearly births of its new sons. He has seen its splendid progress. But he had also noticed that beautiful as it was within, it was outside scrawny and unlovely. What was he a regent for, if not to be a new broom? So he went over to Berkeley and told the boys that the grounds were unworthy, the walks unattractive, with plenty of room for a lawn it was all quite forlorn. Then he told them, with tears in his eyes, that the State was short of funds and couldn't make the rifle, but that the grounds needed the spade, and the hoe, and the rake. And when, in a sweet, seducing sort of way, he asked them if they wouldn't all take a hold and give a few days' manual labor and make things lovely, they drew in their breath and unanimously shouted "yes," so loud, that the seals at the Cliff House heard them, and flopped into the sea for joy. But though this was a good many weeks ago, the boys haven't come to time yet, but they are going to. Some one last week asked the fair co-eds to do their share, and get up a bit of lunch for these new manual laborers, but the co-eds didn't see it, and declined to catch on. Beauty is its own excuse for being. The co-eds are things of beauty, and are mostly ready to go with the boys to get an ice-cream soda, but to get lunch for a lot of laborers? Not much.

With sun, and with flowers, and cessation of rain,
The bicycle girl has come forth again.
For weeks, while the mud lay unpleasantly over
The highways, she kept her good "hike" under cover;
And her bloomers, so natty, housed out of the shower.
But she's gleefully donned those trim panties once more.
Now she skims o'er the Park like a summer-wood swallow,
While her mash on his hike doth exultingly follow,
She will not decline at the roadside a lunch.
She will wet her red lips in the lacteal punch,
Charge over the crossings, slow people perplex,
Demonstrating the progress now made by her sex,
In fine she's a daisy, from bottle to curl,
The bloomer-clad, go-ahead, bicycle girl.

The effeminating influence of Leap Year is strongly perceptible in the discussion of the young he buds of the city, anent their costumes at the Mardi Gras ball. Pugilism, the fine arts, gourmandise, wines, literature, and the drama, are all swamped under the perplexing question: "What shall we wear?" Some have made their intentions public, but the majority of sweet young men are still wavering.

Willis Polk, of course, has elected to go as Michael Angelo, with a dash of Burne Jones thrown in on the trousers. Joullin had decided to appear as Apelles, but, as John Stanton had filed a caveat on that intention, generously consented to figure as Apollo, taking Joe Harrington along as his lyre. Senator Jere Lynch will don the light and airy costume of the Pharaohs, but has had some difficulty in persuading Horace Platt to fall in line as his mummy, while General Tom Clunie goes as Gaul, an ancient Gaul, of course, for the General is as modest a man as ever fingered sheep skin; Charles Josselyn's buxom charms will be shown to advantage as the Venus di Milo, and Mayor Sutro, at the earnest solicitation of his friends, will appear on the floor as "The Dancing Girl," by Canova, an exact reproduction of the plaster mince-pie dream on "The Heights." Mr. James Hamilton, the actors' friend, will flash upon the brilliant audience as a railway tie, and Andromache fastened to the rock is the character selected by Billy Brown, but there will be no rye in it. It will be a gorgeous and dazzling spectacle.

The arrival of Mr. Francis Lister, as news editor of the Examiner, has restored Mr. James Tufts to the night editorship, a post which formerly he fulfilled so ably. With a fine scent for news, Mr. Tufts has never lacked discrimination in any dilemma—for a night editor is the most harassed of all the staff.

In days of old, when faith was strong,
And God's ambassadors respected,
Through hours of trial the Lord was nigh,
And succored the suspected.

Yet by the Lord neglected.

Judge Tom Fottrell, of Mill Valley, is an able jurist, whose whiskers, as well as his decisions, are red, very red indeed. In addition to attending to the scales of justice in the valley, this terror of criminals sells real estate to the city people who languish for suburban joys. When the Judge opened his new office he commanded a painter to inscribe his name in bold letters on the window, e'en while he sought the halls of justice to meet out punishment to a Sausalito stranger, who had been discovered in the unpardonable offense of trampling on the grass.

When this audacious scoundrel was tried, found guilty, and loaded with fetters, the Judge returned to his emporium of corner lots. His Honor glanced at his window, and became speechless with rage.

"You infernal son of a paint pot!" he yelled. "I will send you up for twenty days for contempt of court!"

"What's the matter, Judge?" inquired the astonished painter. "Haven't I spelled your name right? I went by the card you gave me—I'll swear to that."

"Yes, you insulting idiot," foamed His Honor, "but don't you see you have painted the name red, red—as—as my whiskers, you treacherous bigamist."

The fortuitous arrival of the town constable alone saved the letter artist from the severest form of condign punishment at the hands of the enraged jurist.

The Reverend George Gibson to the parsons makes objection, Declares their grammar faulty, and sneers at their inflection, Openly insinuates they know not how to pray, Are not worth a farthing candle to light up the narrow way. No wonder, then the preachers rage at this critic cheeky, Whose accent unmistakably savors of "Auld Reekie," While some calm philosophers, all unruffled, smile, And wish him back in Scotia, blessing wise Argyle.

On Monday morning a quail shooting delegation from the Country Club drove up to Point Reyes station and skipped into the rear car of the down train. The hour was early, the air cold and biting, and the sportsmen found the warm atmosphere of the car both comfortable and somniferous. After an unusual delay the train pulled out. In about five minutes Bob Woodward, rubbing his eyes drowsily, remarked to Scott Wilsou:

"How smooth the road is! One would hardly think we were moving."

"Oh, go to sleep," lazily rejoined Mr. Wilson, who had shot many birds and was heavy with fatigue. Silence reigned for some moments, when a whistle was heard.

"A train is approaching on the same track," shouted Aleck Hamilton; "it must be a special; look out for a collision, boys!" The warning awoke the crowd, and all sprang to their feet. Mr. Hamilton was right. A train was approaching, and on the same track. But it was the down train to pick up the club men, the coupling of whose car had broken a few yards from the depot. Thus was the evenness and velvety condition of travel explained, and Mr. Woodward's eulogy on smooth roads made manifest.

It has been shown that the Roentgen method of photography, which has of late made so decided a stir, was first discovered by Professor Dolbear of Tufts College, who succeeded in photographing through wood an inch thick, by means of ether waves set in motion by sparks from a static electric machine. The discovery was announced, and the results published, nearly two years ago. It is astonishing that a thing of so much value was allowed to drop out of sight until the German professor recently took it up, or perhaps, rediscovered it on an independent line of investigation.

THE LATEST AND THE BEST BRAND OUT.

THE WENBAN.

THE Wenban Building at last is in full commission, and already it is the most popular in the city. Architecturally it is one of the most graceful and certainly the most costly (in proportion) structure in the city. Situated at the commanding position of Sutter and Mason streets, it rears itself aloft with the majestic elegance of a Venetian palazzo, which it most resembles in style.

It is constructed of pressed brick and terra cotta, with the heaviest steel girders binding the walls and the floors. Earthquake-proof as well as fire-proof, doubly and trebly, the foundations of the Wenban have been laid in solid rock, and afterward with an overlayer of a heavy covering of concrete.

To render assurance doubly sure, Mr. Simeon Wenban, when he lavished his wealth upon the handsome building, left a lawn twenty feet wide about it, thus sequestering the place from all contiguity. A fire might approach, but it would have to fall short, even in heat, of the Wenban. There are so many private hotels and apartment houses in the city which are perfect fire-traps, untrustworthy for any of the elements, that the Wenban accoutrements of the culinary world. The ranges are very elaborate, and the chef, who has a small army of assistants, is famous in his line.

Back of this, and at the side, is the cold storage room, where it is as "cold as Greenland." In this place meats, vegetables and fruits abound—though in different compartments, of course. There is a long court-yard behind, where one may reach Mason street by a solid stone and cement staircase. This court-yard is especially handsome on account of a splendid stone wall, which rises some thirty feet at the rear, with huge flying abutresses. Near the staircase one finds a large concrete room, in which is located the extensive beating machinery, by which the hotel is kept warm winter and summer; for although the magnificent situation of the Wenban gives it the advantage of every particle of sunlight during the day, still, there are always foggy days even in summer. There are two heaters—one a huge affair, with all sorts of the most modern improvements. Then there is a smaller auxiliary heater, not only for emergency's sake, but in order that the guests of the house may be assured of a good hot bath at any time during the twenty-four hours.

The elevator service is of the latest and most perfect invention. It is run by electricity, for which purpose a very large electric and hydraulic plant has been established, which assures speed, ease, and complete safety. At the superb rounding corner—at Mason and Sutter—on this same street-floor is a magnificent store, which is already occupies a unique position when other considerations are in question.

The grand vestibule is in itself so imposing, and yet withal possessing the simplicity of art, that it is worthy of Florence or Rome. The mosaic tiles at the entrance, after one passes the pilasters with their Hellenic bassorilievo, which were the especial design of a celebrated artist, are fitting stepping stones into the magnificence which is to come. The grand staircase, with its landings and its beautiful gallery, as it winds about the patio—which, by the way, is sheltered at the roof by a marvelous canopy of stained glass—might well compare with any rival.

The Wenban is five stories high, including the street floor, or "English basement," as they are calling it now in New York. It is in this latter that the daintily appointed dining-room is situated, and the guests may look out if they choose, over a pretty bit of lawn, and view the passers-by, just as if they were at Delmonico's, in New York. This dining room facing the east and south as it does, has the first and the last rays of sunlight. There is no lovelier a breakfast room in the country. It is fitted up with all the elegance of a New York café. The huge ornate sideboard, with its brilliant array of glass and silver, gives the room a more home-like appearance, however. Back of this is a large pantry, with its shelves, its large sinks, and its tables and dressers. Leading from this through a hallway, one comes to the great kitchen, which has all the the subject of competition among many merchants. Its immense curved French plate glasses were imported, but especial kilns had to be constructed here to bend them into the exact mold.

On the next two floors above are located the offices of many of our most prominent surgeons, dentists, and physicians—of both allopathic and homeopathic creeds.

These offices are furnished in the most luxurious fashion, and with every detail that the most fastidious taste could ask. One of the most beautifully appointed physicians' suites is that of Doctor Frederick G. Canney, who recently removed here from 924 Geary street. The entire set of his apartments range along Sutter street, and the perfect appointments of his beautiful reception room, with its rich and tasty decorations, are an indication of the beauty of his other apartments. Among other of our best known medicos are Doctor James M. Ward and Dr. Florence Ward, the prominent homeopaths. Dr. George H. Palmer, one of our foremost physicians and surgeons, also has a charming office here.

Mrs. Blitz's The most delightful portion of the Wenban, however, is Mrs. Blitz's domain. This lady has made herself so popular as a hostess in San Francisco, that when she removed to the Wenban from her former domicile, her guests all went with her. Mrs. Blitz's management of her ménage is thorough and delightfully inconspicuous—that is the lady arranges her large household, from the kitchen to the top floors, so quietly and yet so firmly that things move like clockwork.

The apartments in her hotel are furnished with that quiet elegance and good taste which the hostess has ever displayed. There is a salon that Marie Antoinette and the ladies of the old French Court would have raved over. Then there is a superb billiard room and a beautifully appointed dining room for small parties. Indeed, so far as detail is concerned, nothing has been forgotten.

Among the most elaborate suites is that shown in the plate accompanying this issue.

These richly adorned rooms occupy the topmost south-east corner, and command not only a grand view of the Bay, and of the Alameda shore, but also an unsurpassed panorama of nearly all of the city, from the Park to the ferries and the farthest Potrero. They are decorated with rare bric-a-brac, costly porcelain and pottery from all over the world, exquisite marble busts—in short, what with its rich draperies, soft divans, and rare pictures, there is an ideal drawing room in this suite alone.

Attached to the suites are most spacious bath-rooms, with showers and everything one could ask for. The panels are in marble: the baths are of heavy porcelain and very large. Throughout the entire building there is a complete system of gas and electric lights, as well as telephone and messenger service. There is also a large, solid stone and steel vault, such as one finds in a bank, where guests may deposit their most precious valuables with security.

Mr. William P. Shaw, the manager of the Wenban, has chosen for his offices large apartments on the first floor, Mason street side. Besides his duties as manager of this building, Mr. Shaw is executive for Mr. Wenban in his numerous enterprises. Mr. Shaw's long experience in the East has especially fitted him for his responsible position.

Comstock Mining Shares.

It seems like kicking a fallen man, criticising the San Francisco Stock Exchange in its present condition. Its glory is faded and only the most radical reforms can restore it to anything like its former position in the financial world. As a factor in the prosperity of the city, the Exchange must not be under-rated. As a matter of fact, the dull condition of business complained of for some years past, have been due to the decline of speculation in the Board to a point where it is almost obliterated entirely. The declaration of intentions by the incoming Executive, while known to the few who may have stumbled across its rather obscure enunciation, outlines a strong policy which was rather feebly exemplified at the start by a sharp cut in the salaries of officials, who have not been the most liberally paid in the world, in comparison with people in their position in other institutions of the kind. This is rather expressive of a weakness in a quarter where the public looks for strength, and for this reason the action does not merit commendation. But something should be done, and the men to do it are, in the main, members who are too wealthy to deem it worth their while to bother with the affairs on Pine street. They rest perfectly content to let the Board of Directors run matters to suit themselves, whereas their hands are tied to a great extent. All they can do is to bend beneath the crumbling ruins and await the final collapse, which is inevitable unless assistance is speedily obtained. Members financially unable to do business on the outside should be put in a position where they can sell their seats, without having to wear out their existence pending the advent of a purchaser for the building. A fund should be provided for this purpose, and the seats when purchased could be resold to stronger men, in a position to build up the business and revive public interest. As it is, there is no incentive to trade the way matters are running at present. Outside of Occidental, very little interest is taken in the lode, although the mines along the Comstock are in many cases looking exceptionally well. As for the Occidental mine, it looks more like a bonanza every day, and the shareholders are in a most happy frame of mind over the prospects. Hale & Norcross sent down an amount of bullion from the last clean-up, which will leave a margin of $18,000 in the treasury after paying all expenses for the past month. Bulwer was assessed during the week five cents per share.

The New Gold Exchange.

The Gold Mining Exchange of San Francisco is getting into pretty good shape for work, and it is expected that the rooms will be thrown open for business on the 20th inst., with appropriate ceremonies. The new by-laws of the Exchange provide for the listing of mines on the payment of a fee of $20, preparatory to an investigation of the property by experts employed by the Exchange, the expenses, which are placed at a moderate figure, being paid by the owner. It is, then, the intention to provide capital to develop the mines, if arrangements can be made with the owner, the work to be carried on under supervision of the Exchange. The strongest point, however, with the Exchange will be its power to denounce frauds and protect the reputation of the State abroad from the numerous frauds who, from time to time, have been masquerading about as promoters. A black list should be one of the first ornaments set up in the Exchange, for the reference of investors.

Mining Down South.

The mining men of California have devoted their chief attention to the development of the mineral deposits in the northern counties of the State, overlooking the probabilities in this line in the southern districts. The land of the olive and myrtle, orange tree and horn-toads seems to have been relegated to these efforts of nature entirely, and mining has been carried on at desultory intervals and by poor people as a rule. Now, however, a change is rapidly taking place in this direction, and prospecting has revealed the fact that not only does mineral exist, but that it is superlatively rich. A drawback is hinted at in the way of water, but this will undoubtedly be overcome, as all other difficulties are when gold is in question. Some very good news has come up lately from the country in the vicinity of the Colorado river, from a territory covering many miles along both banks of this great waterway. From all appearances, if statements can be relied upon, California may yet be able to boast of a Cripple Creek of its own before the end of the year, now running its so far beneficent course.

Millions at Command.

There will be less talk abroad from this out about any weakness in the financial condition of the United States. The subscription to the loan of $100,000,000 when the lists were thrown open to the people was an eye-opener to some people on the other side of the Atlantic, who have grown old in the belief that they control all the money in the world. The syndicate racket had been worked so long that the impression prevailed very generally among the European powers that America could be crippled financially at any moment by simply tightening the strings upon the money bags in some of their Capitals. The sudden display of wealth by five thousand out of the seventy millions of people in the States suggests immense reserve power, if it ever did become necessary to develop the full financial strength of the nation. It is possible that no one was more surprised than the nation itself. Divided up in so many different communities, scattered broadcast over an immense continent, they probably never before were brought to a full realization of the power which it could wield as a unit.

Prosperous Banking Institutions.

The latest reports from the Bank Commission in reference to the savings banks of San Francisco, shows total deposits of $106,215,356. This shows an increase for the year of $2,114,358. The deposits in the banks of the interior of the State for the same time were $25,297,467, a net gain for the calendar year of over $2,000,000, the most of which is credited to the last half of the year. This makes the total deposits in all the savings banks of the State on January 1, 1896, $133,485,527, against $125,518,778, an increase for the year of $7,966,751. This gain has been made in spite of the net loss of two banks during the year. The net loss in deposits by the withdrawal of three banks against an addition of only one new one, is $646,692. This sum may be properly added to the net gain, as above given, to show the actual increase in these credits during the year.

The Rich App Mine.

Another Tuolumne County Mine which will soon attract the attention of the mining world is the App, a property lying adjacent to the celebrated Rawhide. Although yet in its infancy, the App is an everlasting surprise to its owner, owing to the peculiarly rich character of quartz contained in the ledge. The gold invariably is found in a crystallized form as rare as it is beautiful. This condition of the ledge matter is more marked on the 400-level, which is now being worked, and some of the samples of the ore which have found their way to this city have already caused considerable talk. The general opinion seems to be that the phenomenal luck which has heretofore allured the mining operations of Captain W. A. Nevills, who owns the App ground, and that he has got it again, and even bigger than his bonanza find in the Rawhide.

Working Another Combine.

The Insurance men are willing to try it again, and anything in the form of a compact will go down with most of them. The smaller companies have had a very rough road to hoe for some months past, and their managers will undoubtedly waive many a technicality and proviso, in order to again confine the business within the limit of their range. It is they who will have to make concessions now, as they are and have been for some time past the under dog in the heap. The companies alone will, however, benefit by a temporary arrangement, as it is not likely that the public will be treated with any more consideration than was shown the Underwriters when the wind tore through their scanty wool.

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"

WHEN you get a hundred million dollars laid snugly away, where moth and rust do not corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal, you get to thinking that no pullet from any ordinary hen coop is quite good enough for the little cock, your well-beloved son. So when Cornelius, of the gens Vanderbilt, noticed that his offspring, C. Jr., took kindly to Miss Grace Wilson, whose father, having three daughters, had only about six lovely millions, he was glad that Grace was in Europe. But soon Grace returned. Cornelius Jr., crowed like a gay young rooster, and went over to see her. Then old V. sent young V. to Europe, and Grace left for Europe later. Now C. Jr. and Miss Grace ride in the Bois de Boulogne together, the old gentleman scowls, and the query comes to young Cornelius whether he can stand being cut out of his share of $100,000,000 for the sake of the Wilson maid, and whether or not he can live on his own $20,000 a year, with the income from Grace's little two millions. Also, query: Are the Vanderbilt dollars any better than any other?

IN Germany the opponents of the Government gravely assert that Judge Brauzwetter, who recently died in an insane asylum, was crazy while on the bench, and that the other judges of the Supreme Court knew it. It is with equal gravity asserted that "it would be difficult to prove that the other judges knew of his mental derangement." We know how it is here. A short time ago the lawyers said one of our judges was crazy, but the other judges didn't seem to notice it. He was just like the rest. And the people didn't notice it from his written decisions, for they were no more crazy than the decisions of the other judges. Ask the lawyers, and you will get no better information, for half of them—the half that is beaten—denounce the whole bench in good set terms. But then the lawyers—which of them are altogether sane? When lawyers differ, what judge out of Bedlam will not, by one or the other, be called mad?

THEY have found out over in the Bethany Congregational Church what pool rooms are, but we have not learned what speedless nag they lost their money on. They are so irate that they don't want the City and County to make anything out of the betting proclivities of the people, in or out of that congregation, by selling them licenses. So they passed a resolution to that effect after prayer and before the sermon last Sunday. It is not wise to let the devil have all the money. People will bet, and why not gather some of the coin into the municipal treasury?

THE eye of envy need not longer rest on the distant view of Mt. Tamalpais. There is going to be a railroad to its apex, and everybody can ride up and view the distant city, and slide down again, if they want to. It is going to be built by the California Construction Company, whatever that is. We venture to guess there's money in it, and believe that, ere many months, our own hard-earned nickels will go to swell the coffers of the Mt. Tamalpais Scenic Railroad Company, God bless 'em.

TALK about salaries, and getting money in an easy way out of the City and County Treasury. Nobody can beat the Justices of the peace at that pleasant entertainment, unless it may be the City Hall janitors and the fellows who "divy" with them. Their superb and gracious Honors, the Justices, languidly take their seats at somewhere within a quarter of an hour after ten o'clock, get tired by noon, and retire for lunch until two, except in case they put everything over at noon till the next day, and then they speedily disappear for the day. Yet the promptitude with which they present themselves to give receipts for their salaries, is equalled only by the intense grief which Mrs. Cooper suffers in her sympathy with Dr. Brown.

BROTHER Wendte, of Oakland, is too amiable a man for success as a theological slogger. Father Yorke has knocked him all over the ring. The latter's right is a mauler, and his fighting with his left has excited the admiration of every expert. As for his footwork—when the adversary lets drive both hands, bursting the gloves and letting fall a shower of historical broken glass—it is simply beautiful. Indeed, it is not too much to say that in the domain of spiritual pugilism Father Yorke is at once the Sharkey and the Corbett of the coast. He punches with the force of the one and dodges with the deftness of the other. If the angels have been buying pools, those who backed him are surely swaggering around the New Jerusalem with gilded feathers.

MRS. Stockton's statement that she is as good as Dr. Brown makes her very modest, indeed. Just now no one has a very decided opinion as to just how good Dr. Brown is. Her statement is ingenious, as other of her statements have been. By inference she seems quite willing to stand or fall with the reverend gentleman; to tell the truth with him or to lie with him.

GEORGE A. Knight has appealed his suit by which his position as attorney for the Board of Health was given to Dennis Spencer. It is possible that the eloquent Knight counts himself one of his own clients whom he is anxious not to lose. And it is also possible that by the time Dennis gets through with George they will be willing to trade first names.

"THE Pope's infallible!" cries Yorke,
 "And God's decision renders."
 "You lie!" shout out the A. P. A.,
 The newer faith's defenlers.
 "Egad," the sinner sadly sighs,
 "Since holy men are sundered,
 How can it be that God at all
 From Sinai's summit thundered?"

THE Examiner, which is devoted to the spread of the pictorial gospel of the Female Leg, agrees with Dr. Brown's contention that he is "making a fight for all ministers." Supplied with two such champions, the ministers have not thought it necessary to do any fighting for themselves. They seem to be content to let it go at that.

AMBROSE Bierce brands George A. Knight and Reel B. Terry as "moral idiots." But cow-boys have been known to put their brands on other people's cattle. In the round-up Bierce may lay claim to a mad bull.

IT is stated that during the past year the divorces in Fresno outnumbered the marriages by forty. If this be true, the question arises whether there is anything wrong with the climate.

AFTER the sword contest row at Central Park last Sunday, it seems that the good old days of ancient Rome may return, after all. Verily, verily, what beasts these mortals be.

THIS outcry of the ministers against the gamblers is humorous in the extreme. The one stakes his all on this life, the other on the life to come. Where does the difference come in?

ADENVER priest lately preached a sermon on "Ingersoll." If this continues, the chances are that that gentleman will soon attain to a greater notoriety than did Christ.

SUPPOSE the politicians of Sacramento did vote the names of dead men, what then? There's not much life in elections up there, anyway.

A Book of the Week. * Mr. Percy Andrew's last book, just published, is remarkable in many ways. It is remarkable for its good English, its subtlety of plot, its characteristic dialogue, and, above all, for introducing its readers to a gentlemanly ghost, the disemboweled hero of the story, who eats, drinks, and is merry among reputable, and disreputable, men. Indeed, the book is so remarkable that we are induced to depart from our usual custom, and give our readers an exceptionally long exposé of the plot in order that they may be the better able to understand the kind of book Mr. Percy Andrew places before the reading public of the English-speaking world. The three chief characters of this work are Mr. Stanhope, of Chester, Mr. Wetherington, of Liverpool, and Mr. Jamieson, of London. The two latter gentlemen are in business, and the former—well, the former is—"Mr. Stanhope, of Chester," a handsome young man, a delightful conversationalist, and a mystery. Mr. Wetherington has a daughter and a son, and Mr. Jamieson has a son only. But Mr. Wetherington does not succeed in the world, while Mr. Jamieson does, and yet these two men remain devoted to each other's interests, the successful one standing by his less prosperous friend through all phases of his adversity. Mr. Wetherington's son is convicted of theft, but that does not interfere with Mr. Jamieson's friendship for the father and his daughter, to whom, by the way, Mr. Jamieson's son has become devotedly attached. "Mr. Stanhope of Chester" is first introduced to the reader as the two friends, Jamieson and Wetherington, are traveling from London to Manchester. He is a charming personage, "with as pleasant and as frank a face" as a man ever saw. He is "about thirty," with "fair hair, regular features, good complexion, and soft, blue eyes. He wears a slight mustache and a neatly trimmed beard, and is dressed well." Now, "Mr. Stanhope of Chester" was an old friend of Wetherington's, and yet the latter cowed before him, although "Mr. Stanhope, of Chester" treated Mr. Wetherington with marked attention and flooded him with expressions of confidence and good will. Arrived at Manchester, the three travelers went to the same hotel, had supper, and, as supposed by Mr. Jamieson, retired to bed. Next morning, however, he found that his friend, Mr. Wetherington, had taken the night train back to Liverpool, and that "Mr. Stanhope of Chester"?—"Mr. Stanhope of Chester?", why, no such person, or no third person at all, had dined with the two friends the night before! At least, so the people of the hotel said, and, of course, Mr. Jamieson put them all down as very uellegant hotel men. And the next day Mr. Jamieson heard bad news from his friend, Mr. Wetherington, and so throughout the book, every time that the handsome and brilliant "Mr. Stanhope of Chester" appeared on the scene, some disaster soon after overtook Mr. Wetherington until, at last, he became a refuge from justice, and was found by his friend Jamieson in one of the lowest dens in London, starving to death. But here again "Mr. Stanhope of Chester" appears rushing out of the room occupied by Mr. Wetherington, just as a pistol shot is heard—and Mr. Jamieson, who went to rescue his friend, was arrested for murder and "Mr. Stanhope of Chester," why there were a dozen witnesses to prove that no one passed down the stairs from the time the noise of the pistol was heard until Mr. Jamieson was arrested in the deceased man's room, with a smoking pistol on the floor. Then Mr. Jamieson was tried for his life, and was only saved by the daughter of Mr. Wetherington, who was stopping in Mr. Jamieson's house, finding a letter from her father, written on the day Mr. Jamieson was arrested, and in which, after thanking Jamieson for all his kindness, he said he would kill himself. Well, the dénouement of the whole thing was that there was no "Mr. Stanhope of Chester" at all. He was the ghost of a former friend of Mr. Wetherington, whose wife had been seduced from her home by Wetherington's intrigues, and who, subsequently, killed himself and his wife in a London hotel twenty-five years before his ghost appeared to Mr. Jamieson in Manchester, Liverpool, in the train, and in London. And then it appears that Mr. Wetherington's "daughter" was in reality the daughter of "Mr. Stanhope of Chester," whom Mr. Wetherington had adopted as some slight atonement for the wrong he had done his one-time friend. Such is the story, and the lesson in morality that Mr. Percy Andrew would teach is that if we do wrong the devil will pursue us in this world as well as in the next, and that, do what we will, "Mr. Stanhope of Chester" will be on hand to make our lives a torment if we "covet our neighbors' wives," aye, or their goods or their chattels. Well, yes, but if so, it is not done through the medium of a ghost. Whether the disemboweled "visit the pale glimpses of the moon" or not, we will not now discuss, but when Mr. Percy Andrew seriously tells us that his story is true, then we reply—Fiction; or at least we must demand more evidence before we can be expected to believe it. If he had told us that "Mr. Stanhope of Chester" merely represented the moral conscience which makes cowards of the guilty ones then the book before us would have carried with it a lesson worth remembering, but to solemnly tell us, as Mr. Andrew does, that the incidents related in this book are true is too much for our credulity, and so, in the absence of corroborative testimony, we put the book away as a phantasy or a dream. We are not unfamiliar with the arguments that can be brought forward in favor of believing in ghosts, and magic, and esprits follets, but notwithstanding all Calmet or Bush and their like have told us, yet we see no reason to accept this ridiculous story of Mr. Percy Andrew as true simply because he puts ipse dixit on the book, and says we should believe without doubting all he tells us. This is the blemish we find in "Mr. Stanhope of Chester."

*"Stanhope of Chester," by Percy Andrew. Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York.

"What is Money?" is a book of the sledge hammer order. One of its mottoes is "Strike but hear," another "The truth shall make you free," another "Your silver cankered god's judgment on an infatuated people." These mottoes are typical of its letter press, which is full of adjectives and denunciations of the "gold bugs." The book is dedicated to as many people as a new church bell has spouses—for revenue. Such words as "infamy," "inextinguishable absurdity," "robbery," "jobbery," "hatred of oppression," and pages of denunciatory epithets are flung at all who disagree with the author, who poses as the opponent of "oppression in every form," and "the fearless and incessant advocate of the people's rights." Then the author tells us that "having no carrion-crow syndicate bonds, and not much of anything," he must needs appeal to the friends of "honest money" to help circulate the book. And so, with peculiar elegance, the author turns inside out his empty pockets and says: "Behold." Yes, it is often thus with the friends of silver.

Some time ago a contemporary published a statement to the effect that Colonel Dodge, in his History of Gustavus Adolphus, said that the great Captains who must be accepted as models for whomsoever would succeed in the profession of arms, were Hannibal, Alexander, Caesar, Gustavus Adolphus, Turenne, Prince Eugene, and Frederick. Surprised at this statement, we commented on what our contemporary had said, and stated our belief that the six great military captains of the world were "Alexander, Hannibal, Caesar, Gustavus Adolphus, Frederick, and Napoleon." We had not read Colonel Dodge's book at the time—a book, by the way, which we think admirable, and we now find that our contemporary was wrong, and that our guess at the six great military captains agreed with that of Colonel Dodge. A note from Colonel Dodge first drew our attention to our contemporary's mistake.

"A Jab at the Devil," by the Rev. Wallace R. Struble, is an argument for the creation of a Christian political party in this country. Such a party would be expected to direct the policy of the Government and "Decency" should be its watchword. Well, whatever we may think about the advisability of forming such a party, the author of "A Jab at the Devil" has succeeded in making out a good case. He is terse and clear, and the little pamphlet is well worth reading. The Rev. Wallace R. Struble is an Evangelist. The pamphlet was published at Colon, Mich.

ONE of the favorite forms of speech with the up-to-date bed is what she calls "making a break." This charming phrase was most delightfully illustrated by the maids and matrons who participated in the recent Newhall cotillion as they so gracefully dashed through the paper screens in their quest of a partner for the dance. One of the girls who was at the dinner given the same evening by a lady in the same neighborhood (but not one of the cotillion crowd) remarked when told what the figure was going to be, "Before I'd make a break for any man alive!" Rather good, from that source.

Californians are wont to wax wrothy when spoken of as people in the wild and woolly West. But with all our wealth, with all our beauty in nature and human nature, it must be admitted we are not entitled to be called trained, that essential so absolute in all society which is found in established centres. In Europe—and now in New York—girls are trained how to walk, how to sit down, how to cross a room, and how to enter and leave a carriage. It is not left to a sort of slap-dash, go-as-you-pleasedness to do any of these necessary actions in well-bred circles, but so perfectly are the girls trained, so gracefully do they perform them, it looks like the most unstudied grace. That this course of training would be an invaluable aid to some of our rich men's wives, who can doubt who has ever witnessed some of them entering a ballroom or descending from a carriage? The sling along gait, the "I'm Mrs. So and So" air, the defiant stride, is sadly in need of the polishing process. The wonder is that the several European trips have not produced that result.

The number of marriages which have been arranged or which have occurred here of late, and which have united young men and maidens in our best Jewish circles with those in our best Christian society is really worthy of remark. More and more the "doxies and orthodoxies" will be forgotten, and fierce, intolerant creeds will fade away, under such a beneficent, gracious order of affairs as the bridal wreath. Throughout the Southern States—especially in Georgia and South Carolina—it is said that for years the union between the aristocracy of the Jewish and Christian families has never been a domestic nor a social failure. In fact, Savannah's proudest society has encouraged it. While never courting a religious controversy of any sort, a fair-minded man-of-the-world might ask so liberal and so honest a clergyman as Rabbi Voorsanger whether he entirely disapproves of the ultimate millennium.

A gushing girl from the rural districts wants to know what has become of Wilcox and his bang that they both have been among the missing at social functions so frequently of late. Maus seems to be the coming man in popularity among the women. Like Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup, they all cry for him, but, alas, for the girls, the wily Captain is said to prefer the blandishments of the young matron to the ingénue every time.

It is a long time since San Francisco has been treated to a visit from real right down royalty, and the Poniatowski and Von Schroeder element sunk below the horizon as the effulgence of the Italian King's nephew burst upon our social sphere. The women are all agog, and 'tis safe to say that even Paderewski will not be so much worshipped as the handsome young sailor prince during his stay among us.

It is a noticeable fact that the pretty faces of last year's debutantes are beginning to wear an anxious expression as the present season rolls rapidly on, and will so soon be past and gone. However, the experience of a third year "out" will prove to these girls that it is not always the most devoted beau who becomes a benedict.

One of the whispers of the swim goes that the heroine of Mrs. Gertrude Atherton's latest novel is drawn, in many of its salient points, from a sister of her late husband, George Atherton. There is nothing like having a numerous and available family connection to furnish ground work for a writer, as the old axiom of truth being stranger than fiction makes a rich field to draw from.

"Society will have one subject at least for meditation during Lent," said a Franklin street dowager the other day, "and that is wondering what the surprises will be which are promised as the chief attraction of the Darling cotillion on Easter Monday night at the Presidio hop-room."

A snap shot taken in a society gathering of the period might lead one to suppose that our girls were inclined to the vulgar attitude known as arms akimbo. But the fashion of big sleeves is responsible for this prevailing style.

On dit, among the pretty trifles sent the suffering society boss during his recent illness, was a dainty mouchoir "bedewed with tears," from the girls of a fashionable girls' school. Who would not be the rotund Ed?

The Burton leap year dance is the only one given this winter which can lay claim to having kept the guests together until five o'clock in the morning, which proves conclusively what an enjoyable affair it was.

The large family connection who assisted Mrs. Alvord at her tea last week was a feature of the affair. It is not every hostess who has so ample a following.

In contrast to the unpopularity which Lord Dunraven acquired in this country, it is curious to note how many friends the young Duke of Marlborough is making all over the States, even though he is carrying off one of our greatest heiresses. At a reception during his recent Kentucky trip, they cheered when he drank off a tumbler of Old Saratoga Whiskey, and toasted that State and its lovely women.

Don't fail to chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum after meals. Indigestion fades before it.

"KAIRON GNOTHI."

The Secret in Making Money is in this Old Greek Proverb.—
It Means "Know Your Opportunity."—Some of the Men
Who Made Millions by Knowing How.—Very Valuable Information.

WHEN Commodore Vanderbilt was asked how he made his great fortune of $90,000,000, he replied: "It was an easy matter to become rich; just watch for the opportunity, and then take advantage of it," said he. "I commenced with only a few hundred dollars." But there are many people who cannot recognize the opportunity to make money. They may have a little sum to invest but are not in a position to know what is going on.

It is a well-known fact that Commodore Vanderbilt made most of his fortune by buying stocks at a low price, and holding on until they had an immense rise. He had the peculiar gift of knowing just when to buy and when to sell. Other men have made great fortunes in stocks of one kind or another, among them being John W. Mackay, the Rockefellers, and Jay Gould. They all started with small sums.

Among the stocks that have been sensational in their development is the Bell Telephone stock, rising from a very low price to over 200. This stock has paid large dividends and made the original investors rich.

Ten Millions a Year.

The Western Union Telegraph Company started business with $500,000 of capital stock. Its present capital stock is $100,000,000, and pay $5,000,000 a year net profits to the stockholders.

There are many other high-priced stocks that cost original buyers a very low price, and now pay large dividends on many millions of capital stock.

The Edison Electric is another notable example of wonderful development and profit. A broker who bought twenty shares of the original stock at 45, costing $900, sold half of it a year later, getting $30,000 for 10 shares.

The Pullman Palace Car Company's gross earnings have grown until they are over $10,000,000 a year and the stock has gone up from a low price to 180.

There are many chances for making investments, but there are none like the Railway and Dock Construction stock and many prominent men in banking, railroad and financial circles say this stock, which can be bought now at $10 per share, is sure to sell at 50 before long, and eventually have an immense rise like the Bell Telephone, the Edison Electric and Pullman Palace Car stocks.

The par value is $100 per share and the stock is full paid and non-assessable. The stockholders have no individual liability whatever.

Mr. Edward A. Willson, the well-known Vanderbilt stockbroker, says: "In our twenty years experience we have never handled a stock of such intrinsic merit or one which will pay such big profits. This stock gives the small investor an equal chance with the capitalist, as the small investor generally has to buy at par and be content with a dividend of 6 or 7 per cent. a year. Any one can invest in Railway and Dock Construction stock now at $10 per share (the par value is $100) and they can buy from one share upwards at the same price a capitalist buys a thousand shares. The stock is certain to have an immense rise when investors and speculators become aware of its great value as the earnings will pay four and a half per cent. on the par value of the shares, which equals 45 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at the low price of $10 per share.

Surely this is an opportunity which is met with but once in a life-time.

There will be lively times in this stock when it is listed on the Stock Exchange. We deal in numerous bonds that pay from 4 to 5 per cent. a year. We are so confident of the profits that will accompany investment in this stock that we have not the slightest hesitation advising our clients to sell their bonds and invest in Railway and Dock stock while they can buy it at 10. The company is in solid financial condition, has no indebtedness of any kind, and there are no bonds or mortgages ahead of the stock.

The company owns all the rights, titles, interests in, and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell indestructible piles under U. S. patents. The best engineering talent of the world has heretofore been unable to produce a pile that is absolutely indestructible. Many costly experiments have been tried to make wooden piles impervious against decay and the ravages of marine worms, but the wooden piles only last from six months to a few years, requiring continual replacement at great expense.

Certainty of Profit.

There is an enormous demand for indestructible piles in the construction of piers, jetties, docks, bulkheads, breakwaters, foundations for bridge piers, etc.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are, perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. 3000 miles are now being graded or are under contract; the great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s patent pile in solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Many negotiations now pending will create an immense demand for the stock and cause it to sell at a very high figure.

Prominent bankers say: "The public ought to buy this stock now before the price goes up, for, by securing some of the stock now at 10, they can share in the great profits of development and will more than quadruple their capital very soon as the above are only a few of the many sources of earnings that will cause Railway and Dock Construction stock to rise to a high price.

The very moderate estimate of earnings pays 45 per cent. dividend on stock costing only $10 per share without counting in any profits on contracts with the U. S. Government or New York City. When any of these contracts are closed the stock will sell above $100 a share very quickly.

There will be spent by the City of New York in reconstructing a small part of the city water front about $3,000,000 per year for many years to come. In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, Ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

Old Style—New Style.

In place of the old wooden docks covered by temporary sheds which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

New York City's revenue will be greatly enlarged by this vast increase of taxable property on these new piers.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance to the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $4,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston; they are simply loose rock dumped in the water, forming a pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet at the top above the water. Each jetty is about 4½ miles long. The Railway and Dock Construction Co. build indestructible jetties of same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

In addition to all these immense profits the plans of the R. & D. C. Co. call for an expenditure of about $10,000,000 to deepen the channel at Sandy Hook. The U. S. Government can well afford to spend this sum to benefit the vast commercial interests of the port of New York.

Even Bear Speculators Buy.

Not only the bulls but even the very best judges of values, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, are buying this particular stock now—they are aware of its solid intrinsic merit and magnificent future and confidently predict that this one deal alone will put R. & D. C. stock up to $250 a share—and other large contracts will follow.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction must come into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

Powerful influences that will push this project in Congress will cause an active, booming speculation in the stock, an influential lobby and important railway, banking and political interests are in line for this purpose.

Investors can buy the stock at $10 per share, in lots to suit, from the financial agents of the Company, Messrs. Geo. W. Dunn & Co., Bankers, 2 Wall Street, New York. Non-residents can remit to them for the shares by check, draft, money order, registered letter, or by express, or have the stock certificate sent by express C. O. D.

The price will be advanced shortly.

The officials and large stockholders are well-known practical financiers and business men, whose names are at once a synonym for trustworthy, capable management and a guarantee that any stock in which they invest is safe, solid and very profitable. Among them are George W. Dunn, Esq., President of the company, head of the banking house of Geo. W. Dunn & Co., New York, and president, director and trustee of other corporations; he has been prominent in Wall Street for 25 years as a careful, level-headed financier; Hon. Thomas Murphy, ex-Senator, the famous Collector of the port of New York under President U. S. Grant; the eminent lawyer R. A. B. Dayton, Esq., Counsel of the company, 322 Broadway, New York; Eugene Harvey Esq., banker, Drexel Building, Philadelphia, Pa.; R. M. Stanbrough, Esq., capitalist, West Hurley, N. Y.; Geo. D. Hilyard, Esq., contractor, New York; W. A. Childs, Esq., of the Calumet and Hecla Copper Co., Calumet, Mich.; Edward A. Willson, Esq., broker, New York; Geo. B. Shellhorn, Esq., Receiver Montgomery, Tuscaloosa and Memphis Railway Co., Montgomery, Ala.; Y. Carryer, Esq., of the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company, Field, B. C., Canada; Howard Swineford, Esq., of Howard Swineford & Co., Richmond, Va.; W. M. Shipp, Esq., cashier of Deposit Bank, Midway, Ky.; Jacob Deyo, cashier Huguenot Bank, New Paltz, N. Y.; C. E. Harwood, Esq., cashier Rockville National Bank, Rockville, Conn., and other prominent gentlemen.

The Railway and Dock Construction Company has an absolute monopoly and its earnings will increase with the steady growth of commerce and of railroads.

The secret of making money is in the old Greek proverb "KAIRON GNOTHI" (KNOW YOUR OPPORTUNITY).—The New York Mercury.

A GOOD THING.

A PROJECT is on foot to provide for a prolonged and gigantic exposition of California's products in the great amphitheatre of the Madison Square Garden in New York. This is a move in the right direction and one which it behooves every Californian to help along to the best of his ability. California is known to be an El Dorado of golden possibilities to every Easterner; in fact it is possible that many of them know the vast resources of this State better than we do ourselves. But, unless they have the leisure to travel here and see things for themselves, they have absolutely no opportunity of forming any idea as to the real wealth showered so munificently upon our State from the ice bound regions of the north to the sunny and glorious south. Then, again, many Easterners who start West, either to invest money in the many splendid opportunities here offered them, or to seek a genial climate such as California alone possesses, stop by the wayside in less favored States, little knowing the greater inducements we offer for enterprise and the returns that are so profitable and so assured. These defects will be remedied by an exposition such as the Board of Managers contemplates. Minerals, fruits, grain, timber, will be presented amid beautiful surroundings and in such a way as to attract the attention of the most casual beholder. Models of our universities and of other leading institutions as well as of many world-renowned gold and quicksilver mines will be on exhibit. In fact the Exposition will be a place where intending settlers or investors can get a thorough knowledge of what our capabilities are, and see how vastly superior California is to any other place in the world for investments of every description. And when the Exposition shall be closed it would be a good idea for arrangements to be made whereby certain of the exhibits can be kept on view continually, as they are by our State Board of Agriculture on Market Street.

DEAR EDITH:—The Marie Antoinette rage, as was predicted, is likely to depart with the winter. But those who contemplated a resort to days of Josephine and the Empire will be disappointed. The tendency is now all towards the de Medici and the Henri Quatre eras. Gowns of the latter period, with ruff and padded hips are the fashion in Paris and New York. I saw one of brown boucle Capucine; the bodice of brown velvet, with a satiu front of the same shade, consisting of a box-pleat in the centre, edged with a ruffle of browu gauze and two pleats on either side, also finished with a gauze ruffle. Four painted buttons framed in brilliants are placed at intervals in box-pleat, which hangs down the centre like a blouse and falls over the belt of ribbon. Underneath this belt begins at the hips a pleated six-inch strip of the velvet. About the throat is a ruching of brown gauze.

Yes, there is no doubt that dresses are beginning to widen at the hips decidedly. A rose silk gown recently displayed a plain skirt flaring very much. The bodice was of pink satiu. A tight belt, studded with imitation gems in front, on either side of which are two stiff loops of ribbon standing straight out. A ribbon collar at the neck has stiff loops to match.

Already women are beginning, as I have said, to speak more of spring and summer than of the present, so far as dress materials are concerned. The pretty checked English silks will be quite the rage this summer. So will the Scotch tartan plaids. The checks are in large cross-bars instead of the small solid blocks of one color alternating with white. The plaids are very lovely this year and combine greens, whites and blacks, or delicate violet, rose and green.

Grenadines are coming greatly into favor now that the season has begun for Honolulu trips on this side of the continent, or for Florida and Bermudan visits from the Eastern society contingent. Grenadines have always been exceedingly popular, and they are apt to have a longer reign than ever before, this time, on account of the exquisite new styles. They range in texture from the gauzy and diaphanous silk muslin to the large canvass woven squares. The designs are in pretty green leaves, or else a dark ground with rosy blossoms. Otherwise stripes are much in vogue. In many cases the stripes are of Moire or of velvet and very narrow, while others are wide, alternating with vines of Eglantine. On the most fragile grenadines the satin pink and black stripes are the mode.

By the way, a correspondent writes that ladies do not put their names and addresses on tiny silver plates on the bicycles in Europe or in the East. It seems that far too often impudent intruders and a curious public have sought to identify and recognize the fair owners through this means. Instead, they have a crest or monogram, printed upon the frame, and find it just as easy to recognize their own machines.

It was foretold last December that shirt waists would probably go out of fashion this year speedily. Now comes the news that they will be more the style than ever, and that manufacturers are preparing millions of shipments. The newest idea in the shirt waist is very fine Batiste, patterned exactly like India and Cashmere shawls. Another favorite will be the embroidered grass cloth or dainty white mulle.

BELINDA.

The "Argonaut" is one of the most popular brands of Kentucky Bourbon Whiskeys, and one of the purest and best found in this market. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, where they are now located, are the agents for this excellent whiskey on the Pacific Coast, and are also the authorized agents for the celebrated J. F. Cutler Bourbon. The trade will make no mistake in buying the Argonaut brand.

It is more difficult to secure genuine old Japanese vases and bronzes nowadays in Japan than it is to buy them from George T. Marsb & Co., at 625 Market street, under the Palace Hotel.

All the Clothes,

all at once, makes too much of a wash, perhaps. Use Pearline, and it's easy to do a few at a time. Lots of women do this. They take the napkins, towels, handkerchiefs, hosiery, etc., each day as they are cast aside. Soak them in Pearline and water, boil them a few minutes, rinse out—and there they are, perfectly clean. No bother, no rubbing. When the regular wash-day comes, there isn't much left to do. Why isn't this just as well as to keep everything and wash in one day?

Beware of imitations.

A LAWYER'S ADVICE ON THE BIBLE.—Among the "Open Letters" in The Century for January is one on "Advice to a Young Lawyer," in which the writer gives the substance of several old letters recently found in a package in a Washington garret, written by such men as Webster, Clay, and Calhoun. These letters were addressed to a young man who had requested the views of the statesmen named as to the best course of study to pursue preparatory to entering the legal profession. One letter written by Senator B. W. Leigh, a famous Virginia lawyer, is specially interesting. After mentioning several works of history, politics, and law, Senator Leigh says: "I advise every man to read the Bible. I speak of it here as a book which it behooves a lawyer to make himself thoroughly acquainted with. It is the code of ethics of every Christian country on the globe, and tends, above all other books, to elucidate the spirit of law throughout the Christian world. It is, in fact, a part of the practical law of every Christian nation, whether recognized as such or not."

—Justice Stephen J. Field, the oldest member of the supreme court, is expected to retire from the bench at the conclusion of the present session of the court, says a Washington dispatch to the Boston Herald. He has said to Senator White of California and other intimate friends that he intends to let President Cleveland select his successor, and that he proposes to make the vacancy by retiring this spring. He has gone further, and has said to them that he would like to see his friend, Judge Erskine M. Ross of Los Angeles, Cal., appointed his successor, and that if consulted by President Cleveland, as he might expect to be, he would strongly advise the appointment of Judge Ross.

—Among New York clubmen, who are of an epicurean disposition, a new fashion, and one somewhat difficult to follow, has sprung up; it is that of having each week a number of ready-prepared dishes sent direct from Paris and timed to arrive at New York on Sunday, which day is set aside apparently for the imported dinner. Two epicures, however, last week, not content with a few dishes, ordered an entire dinner to be brought across the sea. Everything—soup, fish, meat, sauces, dessert, wines, even the mustard, was despatched from Paris a week before the intended date of the dinner. The menu left nothing to be desired, but it is doubtful if a Paris dinner, after crossing the Atlantic, can be worth eating.

—The commission of the Paris exhibition of 1900 has decided that the exhibition shall be confined exclusively to the left bank of the river, with the exception of the Trocadéro, which is to be included, says Court Journal. The commission also decided that the Champs-Élysées should not be touched, and that the Palais de l'Industrie should be maintained. This will be practically the same site as was used for the exhibition of 1889.

—The Duke of Marlborough is having the lake at Blenheim cleaned out, a very large number of men being employed. The cost is estimated at about £19,000 ($95,000), say the London Court Journal, and it is expected that the work will take a long time to complete, the lake being a very large sheet of water. For some years past the greater part of the magnificent ornamental water at Blenheim has been choked with weeds.

—"I have learned from observation that three things surely happen to a man who works steadily, without relaxation. In the first place he becomes nervous, irritable and hard to get along with. In the second place the grade of his work falls off and he is liable to err in his judgment. In the third place he dies suddenly. It is an uncontrovertible law of nature."—Chauncey M. Depew.

"CUM GRANO SALIS."—A brief telegram from Ogden a few days ago confirmed by later dispatches from Union Pacific sources, states that there had been a salt storm during which for two hours salt fell and gathered on the wires and insulators between Ogden and Echo, says Railway Review. It is supposed that the salt was gathered up from the great lake and that the moisture evaporated, leaving the crystals. The Union Pacific started an engine out from Ogden with a hose attachment to wash the salt off, as it seriously interfered with the working of the wires. The engine moved along slowly, with the water turned on the wires. The scheme was entirely satisfactory and cleaning the wires was completed in a short time. This is the first time in the history of the Union Pacific, or of railroading, for that matter, that there has been such a phenomenon.

EFFECT OF HIGH PRESSURES ON WOOD.—Soft wood becomes stronger than hard wood under pressure. The case of a block of Oregon pine, taken from the middle of an upright which formed a part of the timber support in the Comstock mines for twelve years, gives an example of the effect of heavy pressure on wood fibre. It is so hard that it cannot be cut with a knife, and one of its sides is polished from the squeezing it has undergone. Yellow pine from the lower lever of the Comstock has been so compressed by the enormous weight that its density exceeds that of lignum vitae.

CHARACTER IN THE HAIR.—Dark brown locks are always loyal; women with rich, dark-red hair are amiable and sweet; women with pale blonde hair of the colorless, ashy kind are impulsive and loving; black hair denotes a high-strung, tempestuous nature, full of sentiment; women with fine light red hair can do anything well that they attempt, but are inclined to be nervous and sensitive; women with fine brown hair, with a tinge of gold in it, usually have fits of despondency, but cheerfulness predominates in such a temperament.

SALOL TABLETS.—The Pharmaceutical Journal states that in England a patient, under medical advice, had for some time been taking tablets of salol, when intestinal obstruction was set up and an operation became necessary. "On opening the body the intestine was found packed with the salol tablets unaltered. This was probably due to the pressure used in forming the tablets. The more finely comminuted and loosely packed an insoluble or difficultly soluble remedy, the easier it is absorbed by the system, and consequently substances like salol should never be given in tablet form."

UNDERGROUND WIRE.—St. Louis has notified the electric lighting and street car companies to get their wires underground by January 1st, 1900, under penalty of having all left above ground after that date cut down by the city. A pretty general movement of this sort will soon be under way.

—The tower at the Budapest exposition next year is to be 1625 feet high, or 650 feet higher than the Eiffel of Paris. This excelsior business will probably stop some time.

—It is said that foods stored in an atmosphere of carbonic-acid gas are preserved indefinitely, the freshness and flavor being retained better than by the use of ice.

THE OTHER ONE.—THE BOOKMAN.

SWEET little maid with winsome eyes
That laugh all day through the tangled hair
Gazing with baby looks so wise
Over the arm of the oaken chair,
Dearer than you is none to me,
Dearer than you there can be none,
Since in the laughing face I see
Eyes that tell of another one.

Here where the firelight softly glows,
Sheltered and safe, and snug and warm,
What to you is the wind that blows,
Driving the sleet of the winter storm?
Round your head the ruddy light
Glints on the gold from your tresses spun,
But deep is the drifting snow to-night
Over the head of the other one.

Hold me close as you sagely stand,
Watching the dying embers shine;
Then shall I feel another hand
That nestled once in this hand of mine;
Poor little hand, so cold and still,
Shut from the light of stars and sun.
Clasping the withered roses still
That hide the face of the sleeping one.

Laugh, little maid, while laugh you may,
Sorrow comes to us all, I know;
Better, perhaps, for her to stay
Under the drifting robe of snow.
Sing while you may your baby songs,
Sing till your baby days are done;
But, oh! the ache of the heart that longs
Night and day for the other one.

A NIGHT'S REBELLION.—LEONORA BECK, IN TRAVELLER'S RECORD.

Strong in my heart old memories awake,
To-night!
Live on my lips dead kisses burn;
Hot to my eyes wept tears return;
Forgotten throbs my pulses shake,
To-night.

Love is avenged—my buried love—
To-night.
The weakling Present slips away;
The giant Past alone has sway,— Potential as the gods above,—
To-night.

And let him reign! I'll hold my soul,
To-night,
In glad fief to this mighty Past;
My false allegiance off I cast,
Deny the Present's petty toll,
To-night.

Take royally, great Past, my king,
To-night!
To-morrow's sun may thee unthrone;
But eyes, lips, heart—all that I own
Of treasure—I before thee fling
To-night.

FORGETFULNESS.—R. A. THORPE.

I ask one boon of heaven. I have indeed,
And I will tell it thankfully, filled high,
Nor ruffled, as I drank it, with a sigh,
The cup of joy; to love has been my need,
And to beloved—and oftimes could I read
In other's hearts with mine a sympathy:
But joy and love beam on us but to die
And foster memory, most bitter weed.
And this has been my bane, to fling behind
One look into the west, where day dwells yet,
Then turn me shivering to the cold night wind
And dream of joys and loves that long have set:
'Tis for this sleepless viper of the mind
I ask one boon of heaven—to forget.

A WRITER in the New York Herald says in relation to the bicycle and health: "It is becoming customary nowadays to prescribe cycling for many of the ailments in the treatment of which outdoor exercise is an important factor, and the results in the large majority of cases justify all the good that is expected. The danger that must always be guarded against is overindulgence. The very fascination of bicycle riding is often a strong objection to it as a curative agent on account of the danger of overexertion, and there are many who should be the most careful, who become so delighted and invigorated with the exercise that they overdo it. All exercise, and particularly cycling, should be indulged in moderation, and the use of the wheel increased very slowly. It should be remembered that new sets of muscles are developed, and the heart given increased action. The heart grows stronger and accommodates itself gradually to its greater work, and too much strain should not be put on it at once. Cycling cultivates the good habit of deep breathing, increases the chest expansion and strengthens the muscles of the back. In fact, there is no exercise that brings into play so nicely and so gently the many different parts of the body without giving violent work to any particular group of muscles. No harm can result, and the greatest benefit will be derived if the beginner will beware of overindulgence and persist in the pleasures and security of moderation.

The bicycle has done innumerable good things for everyone; rich and poor, proud and humble, of both sexes alike are getting the beneficial results of the glorious sport, and though perhaps one of the least noticed reforms that has taken place on account of the bicycle, yet one of the greatest is this very thing—the doing away with corsets and tight lacing. This means for women that, though the waist may be larger, the lungs will be fuller, and the whole system will be improved and given an opportunity to glory in the fountain of health. Corsets, in retarding the full power of the lungs, naturally prevent them from performing the duties required, and thus breed consumption, disease and death. The new benefits to be derived from cycling are appearing every day, and every woman in the land would possess a machine did she but know of this one great benefit.

The following table will show the number of revolutions of a bicycle in covering a mile when geared to certain points:

Gear.	Revs.	Gear.	Revs.

55.....	366	80.....	251

CYCLING VERSUS MORPHINE.—"In Chicago—that city of hurrying men and restless women," says The British Medical Journal, "there were, so a popular preacher said not long ago, no fewer than 35,000 persons who habitually took hypodermic injections of morphine to save themselves from the pains and terrors of neuralgia, insomnia, nervousness, etc. Cycling has become the rage in Chicago as elsewhere, and the morphine-takers have discovered that a long spin in the fresh air on a cycle induces sweet sleep better than their favorite drug. The result is said to be that the number of those in Chicago who take hypodermic injections of morphine is diminishing. Exercise and fresh air are known to all doctors to be the cure for half the ills flesh—and especially nervous, overwrought city-bred flesh—is heir to."

PADEREWSKI'S "SINGING TONE."

THE supreme achievement in Paderewski's technique is its demonstration that the "singing tone" and perfect control of every variety of tone-color are possible in all circumstances, no matter how difficult the passage. This is said to be the explanation of the wonderful witchery of sound which he produces. "The Pianist" says: "There was a time when it was considered sufficient to play a rapid-running passage or involved phrases smoothly, accurately, and without pondering. But that has not satisfied Mr. Paderewski. He has held the theory that the singing tone must be preserved at all hazards, and his study has been to perfect his digital facility to that end. His control of the striking force of his fingers is masterful. His employment of the different positions of fingers, wrists, and forearms is always correct, and its results are perfect. Pianists know that some teachers advocate the elevation of the back of the hand, and others its depression. Mr. Paderewski uses either position, according to the tone he desires to produce; and his pedaling is simply beyond description. He seems to do almost as much playing with his feet as with his hands; and it is all for the sake of tone-color, for it is the combination of expert pedaling with the variety of touch that colors the tones.

"But even the singing tone would become monotonous were there no rhythm in the playing. Rhythm in piano playing resolves itself into correct timing and accentuation. Every note must have its proper duration or the rhythm is disturbed. Every tone must be sounded with the correct dynamic relationship to those which precede it and those which follow it, or the rhythm disappears. Further than that, the contours of the melodies are spoiled. The phrasing is disarranged, and the musical outline of the composition is distorted. Rhythm is, of course, primarily a matter of artistic judgment, but it is conveyed to the hearer by the blows of the fingers, and is the mechanical result of absolutely just distribution of force. It is, therefore, dependent on the same technical accomplishments as tone-color. Mr. Paderewski's rhythm is flawless. He never offends the most judicious listener either in quality or dynamics, but on the contrary accentuates in such a manner that the phrasing of a composition comes out in the clearest possible light."

A FAST RUNNER.—Deerfoot, the famous Indian long distance runner, died on the Cattaraugus reservation near Buffalo, Saturday. His proper name was Louis Bennett. He was born in 1826. In 1861 he went to England, where he defeated the English champion runners and was received by the prince of Wales, who presented him with a purse and a souvenir. Subsequently he took part in races in New York and Chicago, defeating all comers. Deerfoot's greatest record was made in London, where he ran 10 miles in 52 minutes.

—Max O'Rell was asked, at a dinner in London recently, which he considered to be the most popular book of poems in all "English-speaking" literature—British or American. "Mother Goose's Melodies!" replied the Frenchman. I find that her annual sale of her poems is double that of Shakespeare, Tennyson or Longfellow.

IT is worthy of mention that the Lord only calls his chosen shepherds to fill lucrative and important positions. The Damians of the church are not in it with the Dilles.

WHILE there has been enough going on to keep our fashionables tolerably busy, the month of February has not, thus far, been such a mad whirl of gaiety as it was thought the immediate ante-Lenten season would be. The month opened with Mrs. Antoine Borel's violet tea on Saturday last, which proved to be one of the pleasantest given this season. The charming old house, which in the past has been the scene of some of the most brilliant entertainments San Francisco has ever known, was again thrown open to the Four Hundred, artistically decorated with flowers and foliage, and redolent of the sweet blossoms from which it took its title, and filled with guests during the late afternoon hours. Mrs. Borel was assisted by her daughters in receiving her friends, and in attendance was a bevy of young maids and matrons, who saw to the creature comfort of the guests most efficiently. Mrs. William Alvord gave a tea at her residence on Broadway the same day, which attracted a large attendance.

Last week ended delightfully with the teas above mentioned. Mrs. Willis's theatre party, followed by supper, and the ball given by the Cercle Français at the club rooms, on Post street, which were beautifully adorned with foliage and bunting, and filled with elegantly attired ladies and their escorts. An elaborate supper was served at midnight, after which dancing was again in order until a late hour. One of the most attractive belles of the ball was Miss Mildred Nathan, in her strikingly beautiful cloud of pink and lace.

Miss Jennie Catherwood was the first hostess of this week, giving one of her high teas on Sunday, at which music was one of the features of the occasion.

The Grant-Pond wedding was the principal event of Monday evening; Mrs. Jewett's tea on Tuesday was a pleasant affair, which can also be said of the hop at the Presidio on Tuesday evening; the Goad-Hooker wedding was the leading feature on Wednesday; Baroness von Schroeder's luncheon and Mrs. Emmanuel Heller's dinner were both on an elaborate scale, and in the evening the young people's Leap Year cotillion at Lunt's Hall was much enjoyed. On Thursday the Jarboe-Bull nuptials were celebrated at noon, and in the evening the Concordia Club gave the second of their series of entertainments for the present season. Last night there was a dance at the Van Ness Seminary. Society elected that theatre parties should not be largely in evidence on Monday evening, but will, it is anticipated, make amends in that direction to-night. Still there were several given at the different theatres, and during the week there have been a number every night.

St. Luke's Church, on Van Ness avenue, looked at its best on Monday evening, when Miss Isabel Grant and Ed. Pond were married. The decorations of green garlands, palms, and yellow daffodils made an effective contrast, while the brilliant lights and crowd of gaily dressed guests added to the scene. As the guests were assembling Mr. Sabine, the organist of the church, entertained them with some excellent musical selections; but when he struck the opening notes of the wedding march, every one's attention turned to the door, from whence appeared the bridal party. First came the ushers, Messrs. Chas. Graut, Henry Wilson, Phil Thornton, Charles Farquharson, Alpheus Clement, and Sam Pond. Then appeared Miss Fanny Grant as maid-of-honor, closely followed by the petite bride, leaning upon her father's arm. As they advanced slowly up the centre aisle the groom and his best man, Albion White, emerged from the vestry room, and stood awaiting the cortege. Arrived at the chancel, the Reverend Alfred Brewer, of San Mateo, assisted by the Reverend W. H. Moreland, rector of St. Luke's, quickly tied the nuptial knot, and the procession re-formed, passed out, and were driven to the residence of the bride's parents on Lyon street, where a limited number of friends, in addition to the bridal party, were bidden to the wedding supper. The bridal robe was of white satin, trimmed with lace which had been used by her mother and grandmother, a long tulle veil hung to the edge of the train, and was confined to the hair by a diamond bee, the groom's gift. Miss Fanny Grant wore a gown of daffodil colored satin, draped with chiffon; the bride carried an ivory-bound prayer book in lieu of flowers, the maid-of-honor a bouquet of bright daffodils. The presents, which were numerous and handsome, were displayed in an upper room; they comprised cases of silverware, china, glassware, and endless bric-a-brac. Mr. and Mrs. Pond left on Tuesday for a honeymoon trip to the South.

The wedding of Miss Ella Goad and Osgood Hooker on Wednesday last was a delightful affair. It took place at the residence of the bride's father, W. F. Goad, on Washington street, and was witnessed by a large assemblage of friends of both bride and groom. The spacious house with its broad hall and large drawing-rooms had been decked with a profusion of flowers of every hue, no one color predominating and no set arrangement observed, but the effect of this studied carelessness was extremely pleasing. A sort of prie-dieu of soft silken cushions was placed in front of the large mirror in the north parlor and here the ceremony was performed. The hour set for the wedding was five o'clock, and by that time the guests were assembled and waiting for the bridal party to appear. Behind the cushioned erection stood the Reverend D. Fonte of Grace Church, and at the front the expectant bridegroom, attended by his brother, Robert Hooker, of Spokane. Soon the notes of the wedding march broke the stillness of expectancy as Dr. Harry Tevis, a life-long friend of Miss Goad, played the familiar strains, a straggled orchestra accompanying him. Then Robert Eyre, Milton Latham, Max McNutt, Nick Kittle, and Ernest Folger stepped to the base of the broad stairway and stretching white satin ribbons formed a passage across the hall for the bride and her party to pass through on their way to the drawing-room. Her pretty sisters, the Misses Aileen and Genevieve, led the way, and then the sweet bride came escorted by her father, her countenance radiant with happiness. A murmur of admiration greeted her appearance. The snowy folds of her white satin bridal gown with its elaborate lace garniture was covered from head to foot by a flowing tulle veil caught with sprays of orange blossoms, and the bouquet was lilies of the valley. The bridesmaids were robed in white satin, covered with chiffon, trimmed with Valenciennes lace, and each wore short tulle veils from the back of the head; their bouquets were roses. It did not take long to make this happy young couple "one flesh," and then congratulations hearty and sincere were showered upon them by their friends. The wedding cake having been cut, toasting and feasting followed, and finally adieus were said with all good wishes to the happy pair. The locale of the honeymoon is known only to the bride and groom, and their absence from town will not be of long duration. The presents were numerous and beautiful.

St. Luke's Church was a second time this week the scene of a society wedding, that of Miss Kate Jarboe and J. Case Bull, which took place at noon on Wednesday. The decorations of the sacred edifice were confined to the chancel, and, while simple, were in excellent taste, a mass of foliage artistically arranged, the sole touches of color, coming from two huge bouquets of red roses placed upon the altar. The organist gave a pretty selection of airs upon the organ while the guests were being seated by the ushers, Messrs. Ed. Sheldon, Ad. Mizner, Richard Harrison, Sam Boardman, Frank Owen, and Professor Richardson, of Berkeley, who were all got up in the regulation dress for morning weddings. Gray trousers, and gloves, and Pruce Albert coats, with a red rose bud as boutonniere. Promptly at the noon hour white satin bands were stretched down either side of the centre aisle, and the bridal cortege entered. First advanced the vested choir of the church, chanting the Lohengrin chorus, then the six ushers, followed by Miss Kate Clement as maid-of-honor, and finally the handsome bride with her brother, Paul Jarboe At the church steps the groom and his best man, C. P. Henry, awaited their coming, and the nuptial knot was tied by the Reverend W. H. Moreland. The bride looked regal in her wedding robe of white moire, which was richly trimmed with lace, a long tulle veil completely enveloping her stately figure. Miss Clement wore a gown of peach colored Dresden silk trimmed with chiffon, and a beauty hat with many plumes. After the ceremony a breakfast was served at the Jarboe residence on Taylor street, to which only a few intimate friends were bidden, and Santa Cruz is where the honeymoon is being passed.

The latest engagements are those of Miss Jennie Schwabacker to Charles M. Rosenbaum, Miss Dorothy Baruth to James Proctor Whitney.

The date for the Huntington-Holladay wedding, which will be solemnized in New York, is set for Tuesday, the 25th inst.

The recently wedded bride and groom, Mr. and Mrs. Stern, nee Elsie Mayer, are among late arrivals from the East, and since their coming have been the recipients of numerous hospitalities on the part of their many friends in San Francisco. They are domiciled at the Palace Hotel for the present. The Misses Bee and Ethel Hooper are the guests of Mrs. Catherwood-Darling, at the Presidio. Mrs. W. H. Morrow's new address is 2005 Steiner street, where she will be "at home" on Fridays. Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Crooks are back in San Francisco after a lengthy visit East. Mr. and Mrs. Minthorne Tompkins and their daughters have returned to their home in Ross Valley after a visit of several weeks to the city.

The Tallant "cobweb" luncheon, the Vou Schroeder dinner, Miss McBean's luncheon, the Sorosis reception to Ed. Townsend, Mrs. Frank Sullivan's luncheon in honor of her sister-in-law, Miss Henrietta Sullivan, the Boardman dinner, and Miss Mills' card party were among the affairs of last week not heretofore noticed. In the way of dances on the tapis, the Monday Night Club and the Friday Fort-nights each give a dance on their respective evenings next week. Miss Ella Hobart will be the leading spirit of the latter, which will be a Leap Year cotillion. Next and last on the list comes the Mardi Gras ball, at the Art Institute, for which society's buds and blossoms are busily preparing costumes, though many of the fair ones intend to simply don domino and mask.

There has been given no more charming or unique entertainment in San Francisco than that which Mr. I. W. Taber gave at his great studio last Saturday night. It was a Japanese fête, and, after the season of the year in Japan just now, when the cherry tree begins to bloom, they called it a Cherry Tree Party—or, to be exact, "Sakura No Kirai." All this was superintended by the Japanese artist, Mr. Z. Yamabe, who furnished all the beautiful decorations and the lovely favors which were afterward distributed to the guests. There was present a real Japanese orchestra of trained musicians. The ball which followed was led by Mr. Taber himself and his lovely little daughter, Miss Louise. The guests, who were more than a hundred strong, were all en japonais et japonnais. Lanterns that Pierre Loti would envy were strung and interlaced over ceiling, wall, and door. It was a translation to old Tokio.

The Gentlemen's Wednesday Evening Club gave a most charming reception, February 5th, in their Alameda home, to the ladies of the Shakespearian Club, which is composed of nearly forty of the most clever and fascinating young women across the bay. The Wednesday Evening Club did this entirely out of revenge, because the ladies of the Shakespearian had made them their guests before, and that not long ago. There are nearly sixty members in the Wednesday Club, and they were lavish in their expenditure. The supper which interrupted the dancing was a perfect feast, but, nevertheless, they danced till daylight afterward.

San Francisco is to have an opportunity of judging of the merits of the 7-20-8 company of amateurs who so recently gave such a successful performance in the city of the oaks, as it is to be repeated for the benefit of the King's Daughters' Home for Incurables, and the Columbia Theatre selected as the locale.

The Prince Louis of Savoy will be the guest of Prince and Princess Poniatowski during his sojourn here—that is, for most of the time. It is said that Mr. and Mrs. Will Crocker will give a beautiful entertainment next week, which will include Burlingame and the Country Club. Prince Poniatowski has an Italian title, and is an old friend of Prince Louis, so that festivity will reign supreme.

Mrs. Darling's announcement of her intended dance on Easter Monday night at the Presidio gives assurance that the april Lenten season will at least open brilliantly, though from other good things that are whispered about the indications are that, while it lasts, it will be lively. There will be several weddings included in the number of projected festivities, the Masten-Ewell ceremony coming first, as it is named for Easter week.

Captain and Mrs. W. A. Nevills arrived in town during the week from their Sonoma residence, and occupy their old apartments at the Palace.

A NORWEGIAN explorer, with an obsolete and unpronounceable name, is desirous of reaching the South Pole. The world at large has been anxiously awaiting the opening up of its northern brother for the last century and a half, and it is dishonorable in the extreme when one of these adventurous gentlemen advocates a change in the style of discoveries. Give us the North Pole or give us nothing. In the meanwhile, however, the grins of the two Poles are audible even in San Francisco.

HAVE a time and place for everything, and do everything in its time and place, and you will not only accomplish more, but have far more leisure than those who are always hurrying, as if vainly attempting to overtake time that had been lost.—Tryon Edwards.

THE character of sarcasm is dangerous; although this quality makes those laugh whom it does not wound, it, nevertheless, never procures esteem.—Oxenstiern.

NONE are so seldom found alone, or are so soon tired of their own company, as those coxcombs who are on the best terms with themselves.—Colton.

It will be of great interest to the public to learn that the Lurline Baths are making an elaborate improvement to their institution in the shape of a genuine Russian bath, which will also include the "Needle" shower bath. This luxury will be available to all the bathers at a very slight advance in price. The fact that the Lurline tank is renewed by water fresh from the sea every night, is one of its chiefest charms.

MY LADY.

I smile my sweetest, when by chance
I find myself beneath her glance.

I speak in chosen voice and phrase,
And lose no time to speak her praise.

If service I can render her
I'll not delay, not yet demur.

I hang upon her lightest word,
As if 'twere wisdom newly heard.

Her gowns I note in compliment,
And flatter to her heart's content.

With pretty speech my head is stored—
I'm owing her for two week's board.

THE NOSE.

In all ages the nose has been regarded as strongly indicative of character.

A nose of proper proportions should be one-third the length of the face.

Small nostrils are said by physiologists to indicate small and weak lungs.

Pimples on the nose are frequently caused by indigestion.

Pugilists say that a blow on the nose is attended with more pain than one on any other part of the body.

The nostrils of all birds are located on the back of the bill, and in most birds are so protected by hairs or feathers as to be almost invisible.

A large nose in a weak face is indicative of unintelligence and stupidity. Idiots have such noses.

A sharp nose pointing forward is the characteristic of impudence and curiosity.

A red nose may be due to a choleric temper, a bad liver, or bad liquor. In any case it is an unfortunate sign.

Cats can smell even during sleep. When a piece of meat is placed immediately in front of a sleeping cat's nose the nostrils begin to work as the scent is received, and an instant later the cat will wake up.

The actual quantity of matter necessary to affect the olfactory nerves is very small. A grain of musk in a room will give forth odor for weeks, and yet not be sensibly diminished in size.

Lobsters can smell as well as animals that live upon the land. A piece of decayed meat suspended in the water in a locality where lobsters are abundant, will soon be completely surrounded by a greedy, fighting crowd.

 tendency of certain daily papers to force upon us the disgusting details and pictures of the darker side of life.
 The combined efforts of the women some time ago, in behalf of cleanliness, miscarried. The reputable merchants of the city can do better if they feel so inclined. The home must be protected at any cost.

THE fight against the pool rooms must be kept going.
 They are not only a public nuisance, but a danger to the community and a disgrace to the city. The present laws against them should be enforced without wasting time to gain other legislation. The poolsters should be continually harassed by the police until, out of sheer weariness and disgust, they see fit to close up.

IT is time to protest against the indecent exhibition of women's garments in the windows of stores along our principal streets. Some days ago, Newman & Levinson had a lay figure in their window, attired in a skin-tight suit of nether garment, the effect of which was coarse in the extreme. Such goods are for the inspection of women only, and should be handled inside. The ladies of the city should take some action in this matter.

IT is a well known fact that the brethren of the cloth consider the stage an earthly annex to the infernal regions. The clergymen in England, however, seem to take a different view of the matter. Wilson Barrett states that his nightly audience always contains a dozen vicars and curates, and even a Bishop or two. Well, they probably consider it better to go to the devil like a gentleman than like an ordinary, everyday minister.

THOSE dear sisters who rejoice at the opportunity to walk forward at prayer-meeting and lay flowers on the desk before Dr. Brown, their beloved pastor, are doubtless conscious of a strong emotion. They fancy that the inward warmth which they experience is from God and that it is the soul which is inflamed. Possibly, but it depends a good deal on the age and personal appearance of a lady what construction the calm observer is at liberty to place on her floral tributes. It would be well when a shepherd falls into sin were the churches to ask the sisters to stay at home and leave discussion of his case to the brethren. It does not make for modesty, or chastity either, when women are allowed to participate in the debate, the subject being the pastor's virtue. Moreover, the sisters cannot be expected to be impartial judges, for, in the nature of things, women find it impossible to think very hardly of a man who has gone astray in that manner. After all, it is a tribute to the power of the sex.

BROTHER CASE AND BROTHER BROWN.

BROTHER Case, pastor of the Howard street Methodist Church, is a flabby man. He has a truly Christian mind, if the Christian mind as it has been exhibiting itself in this town of late is typical. On Sunday night last Brother Case arose in the pulpit of which he is the electric light and pleaded for a suspension of judgment in the case of Brother Brown. The grounds for the plea were two: That a man should be presumed to be innocent until he has been proved guilty, and that the editors of newspapers are no great shakes themselves when it comes to morals.

That maxim of the lawyers plays the mischief with the common sense of the laity in times of stress, for they wholly misapprehend its meaning and scope. A man charged with crime is presumed to be innocent only in the court-room and for the purposes of trial. There must be a starting-point, and it is but just to place the burden of proof on the accuser. The presumption of innocence is merely a fiction of the law, adopted in trials for the sake of utility. When a Grand Jury indicts the accused his guilt and not his innocence is presumed; when he is arrested it is on the presumption of his guilt; so also is he deemed guilty when he is locked up or bailed out. In the court of public opinion the legal fiction of innocence is not accepted because the rules of procedure and the laws of evidence are different. In a court of law a man may refuse to take the stand in his own behalf and the Judge will instruct the jury that it must not draw from his silence inferences injurious to the theory of innocence. But as the orders of judges do not control the human mind beyond the court-house, men of sense put their own construction on the muteness of the accused.

If, as Brother Case insists, we should all consider Brother Brown innocent of adultery until a church council has returned its verdict against him, why should we not also suspend our judgment in the case of Mrs. Davidson? The law will presume her to be innocent when she is brought into court, but in the meantime it keeps her in jail as if she were guilty. Yet the case against her, strong as it is, is not as strong as that against Dr. Brown. Had he been innocent, would he have submitted to blackmail? And that he meant to submit there can be no question. He permitted Mrs. Davidson to teach in Sunday school and spoke of her with pious approval after she had bled him. It was only when he knew the old woman had been talking about his amours, and when he saw that exposure through her was inevitable, that he took the aggressive in self-defense and caused her arrest. What brother or sister in the Lord feels that it is a duty to suspend judgment as to Mrs. Davidson? Not Brother Brown, certainly. At prayer meeting and elsewhere he pitches into her without reserve. And those letters of Miss Mattie Overman; what are we to think of them? They give us in black and white the plain accusation of adultery, and Brother Brown has not attempted to explain them. He says his lawyers forbid him to defend himself against the evidence of these letters, but he is garrulous enough in explanation of other things to which he can give a favorable complexion—as, for instance, his triumphant acquittal of charges of immorality by a church council in Rochester, Mich., some years ago. Is his sequestration of the Overman female in his house—the chief witness against him—an act that fits in with the presumption of innocence? Does his attack on Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, through his wife, give us an example of Christian charity? Is he not in all ways fighting like a cornered scoundrel?

The public and the newspapers have a perfect right to examine the evidence for and against Dr. Brown and make up their minds as to its worth. Whether the editors are moral men or the reverse does not affect that right. The Christian clergy propose a standard of conduct for themselves and others, to which they should be held. When one of them departs from it, it is no defense, as even Brother Case should be aware, to plead that those who condemn him are not themselves above suspicion. Should a temperance advocate enter a saloon and drink whiskey, the drinking men who might see him do it would have a right to expose and despise him, though he did only what they had been doing. His offense would be hypocrisy, which is much worse than tipping. Brother Case, had he a mind capable of thinking, would thank the editors for their service in insisting that preachers shall be held to their standard. As it is, we learn from Brother Case that we should not expect holy men to be holy, and are required to turn away so that we may not see when they are minded to indulge the appetites of the flesh.

Let us hope that Brother Case is better than his preaching. If he isn't, such of his congregation as believe the Commandments were meant to be obeyed, will do well to keep an eye on him. He is altogether too charitable to sin as it is represented by Dr. Brown, who is as hardy in his impudence as he was tasteless in his selection of partners when he went forth to imitate David and Solomon, and those other ancient men after God's own heart for whom Brother Case expresses a gentle and touching sympathy.

Despotism's The encroachments of the courts upon the Dire Work. liberties of the people alarm every thoughtful friend of popular government.

Naturally the press is in the line of judicial fire, for the press is the worst hated foe of tyrants on or off the Bench. The latest advance of despotism has been witnessed in Chicago, where the wealthy publisher of a daily newspaper has been found guilty by a Federal jury, and by a Federal judge sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine of $2000. And for what? Merely for publishing as advertisements indecent "personals"—announcements by young women of their places of residence, and that sort of thing.

Two years and $2000! Good heavens, if the example of this Chicago court is to be imitated throughout the country, the jails will be swarming with the martyrs of modern journalism. Every up-to-date paper does what the Chicago Dispatch felt free to do, yet Proprietor Joseph R. Dunlap, instead of taking his usual summer trip abroad to join Proprietor Pulitzer, Proprietor Hearst, and other of his brethren on the Riviera, will put in the warm months at making shoes in Joliet.

A depressing change will now occur in our most widely circulated dailies, for it is not to be expected that the Pulitzers and Hearsts, devoted as they are to the grand work of giving the worst elements of the public what their tastes call for, will risk the State Prison by sending their journals through the mails. We may still for a season have city editions containing massage and manicule ads., and stories of fights and scandals in brothels and dives, embellished with pictures of the dishevelled but beautiful ladies assisting at these functions—we of the town may still for a time have papers that, by scouring the stupid limitations of decency, coin money for their owners, but the unhappy inhabitants of the interior will be compelled to put up with sheets as vapid as deference to propriety and the postal laws can make them. Yet even city readers have reason to apprehend that the era of journalistic dullness will soon envelop them also. For since the Federal grand juries have been aroused by the touch of tyranny a way has been pointed out to the grand juries of counties. Oppression is contagious, and we shall not be surprised to see some of the most eminent newspaper publishers here and elsewhere indicted by mere State authority and sent to jail by State juries and judges for exercising the time-honored privilege of being obscene, or even for instructing the young in house-breaking, burglary, foot-paddery and the like by means of illustrated articles, furnishing to the novice full directions as to how these exciting and heroic industries may be entered upon and pursued.

The outlook is indeed discouraging. The thirty thousand ladies who three years ago petitioned the proprietors of the dailies of San Francisco to publish papers that could be admitted to the home will, perhaps, be stimulated to rude, aggressive and revengeful action. No attention whatever having been paid to their polite and humble petition, what easier than for some emissary of despotism to urge them to visit the grand-jury rooms rather than the newspaper offices? Faced always by the threat of San Quentin's yawning portals, gloom must settle upon the yet debonaire soul of daily journalism, and presently we shall have newspapers which it may actually be possible to read aloud. The truth must be fronted. Slowly it may be, but none the less surely, the daily newspaper will have to be decent. Liberty is perishing, for enterprise will be no match for the police.

Murder Will Out. At last it is apparent why "my two journals, both daily," as Mr. Hearst calls them—have been pouring out money like water in an attempt to defeat the refunding of the railroad's indebtedness to the Government. It has been obvious all along that there was something more at the back of that opposition than met the eye. Nothing in the usual course of newspaper business would justify such extravagant expenditures as we have witnessed both here and in New York City. A local organ was good in its way, but a metropolitan one was better, a fact which accounts for the milk in that cocoanut. The price of a newspaper or two would be a mere bagatelle to Vanderbilt, Gould & Co. if, thereby, the control could be obtained of a great transcontinental railroad. There are millions in such a deal. The signs that there is a money power in the background are too palpable to leave any man in doubt who has a head upon his shoulders. We now know where Sutro's money was coming from. It is also becoming clear how it came about that such prearranged and concerted action was sprung all along the line. The suddenness of the Kentucky move is accounted for. There can be no manner of doubt of the conspiracy that has been organized. Indeed, it is openly confessed, in the simplicity of his mind, by one who, we think, will not be thanked for telling secrets out of school. To no less an authority than Congressman Maguire are the people of California indebted for the open avowal as to who the men are that are behind this fight. In an interview with a Washington correspondent last Monday he said:

"It begins to look now as though the Vanderbilt and Gould interests have deserted the refunding scheme. They were potent factors in its support heretofore. It now seems that the Vanderbilts, at least, are looking for a chance to buy the Union and Central Pacific roads at foreclosure sale, and thus secure a through line from New York to San Francisco. If this be so, the funding bill will be beaten, the mortgages foreclosed, and the road either held by the Government or sold to representatives of the Chicago and Northwestern system.

Judge Maguire is too guileless and outspoken a man to be admitted to the inner circles of the conspiracy, but he is on the spot and plainly sees what is going on. He is not mistaken. From the moment that Thurston was elected United States Senator from Nebraska by a combination of the Vanderbilt-Gould interests, and announced his policy to be a foreclosure of the mortgages and sale of the property, it became clear that there was a powerful conspiracy on foot to crowd out the California owners of the Central Pacific.

That renders it pertinent to inquire whether either the National Government or people of this State will benefit by the crowding out process. It will not mean, and is not intended to mean, the payment of the Government's debt. It means a sale by auction, and that, of course, means the payment of a sum about equal to that for which the road could now be constructed. Nobody cares to pay more for a thing than he could duplicate it for. It is conceded all round that the Central and Union Pacific could now be paralleled for about the amount of the first mortgage bonds. That being so, we know pretty nearly their maximum value to outside bidders. No purchaser of to-day would figure on paying the cost price in 1865 of rails, locomotives, labor, etc. The cost of production at this date would necessarily prevail. As, therefore, only the sum total of the first mortgage could possibly be realized, where would the Government come in with its lien, which, as everybody knows, is only second mortgage bonds? It follows, as a matter of course, that the Government would be out and injured to the amount of nearly its entire claim. It is true that it is being said the Government could bid in the property if it did not approve of the price offered. Yes, it could, if it first agreed to pay off the first mortgage bonds. It would then find itself saddled with a vastly increased debt and a railroad it could not operate with credit to itself or with advantage to the public.

Than all this, the proposition to refund the debt for a period say of fifty years, is so much the better as to require no further argument or demonstration. In the one case the Government would lose all, or nearly all, its claim, whilst in the other it would ultimately receive dollar for dollar. All that the Government is asked to do in that case is to loan that which it has already advanced and for which it is responsible, namely its credit. The Examiner, forced by the Maguire revelation, to admit the reality practically of the Vanderbilt Gould combination is driven to say that it prefers the change in the personnel. No doubt. The Examiner is a New York institution with its headquarters in that city. It has cast its lot with the young millionaires of the Empire city and no doubt finds it to its interests to help pull their chestnuts out of the fire. But the men of California do not feel that way. They prefer the Stanfords and Crockers, whose interests are identical with their own. They know what these great families have done and are doing for the State. They know that whatever money those families make out of the railroad will be invested here. If the late Senator Stanford made a fortune out of his dealings with the Government, that fortune has been splendidly devised for the benefit of the people of this coast. In like manner, the Crockers have given us Park improvements, Old People's Homes, and other public utilities, and, moreover, their money is so invested that whatever benefits California benefits them. What have the Vanderbilts or the Goulds ever done for the Pacific Coast? "The people be d—d" was the saying of one of them, and an abiding principle with both. What interest would either have in California, save that of earning the highest possible dividends to be spent elsewhere? The present managers are with us and of us, and are to be got at and talked to if complaints have to be made. California can be trusted to stand by her own.

The Governor in Court. A slight shock seems to have been given the public's sensibilities because the Governor of the State and Mr. Delmas had a tilt the other day in a Modesto court-room, where His Excellency was told that he did not know what it was to be professional. Harder things than that have been said of Mr. Budd, but as he was not Governor of California when they were uttered, the public was not interested. Of course, if the Governor goes into court as a practicing attorney his official position, being left at the door, will not save him from the treatment which lawyers are in the habit of accorded one another. Mr. Delmas, who is the mirror of stately courtesy, would be the last man to offer disrespect to the Chief Executive, as such, but he is not overcome with awe in the presence of Mr. Budd, attorney-at-law. He feels as free to express his opinion of him as of any other learned brother.

Governor Budd is an innovator. He is the first lawyer elected to the headship of this State who has not abandoned his profession while occupying the office. The others have held that it would be undignified to do otherwise. They have also entertained the belief that it would be discreditable to take advantage of the prominence and power of their official place to secure cases and fees. The assumption that the State pays them for their whole time has been accepted by them.

This assumption Governor Budd rejects. He considers himself justified in adding to his income, when opportunity offers, by laboring as a lawyer. We see him in court at Modesto, serving his clients and quarreling with Mr. Delmas just as he was wont to do before the people made him Chief Magistrate. It is also known that since his election he has been engaged as counsel in the Fair will case, at a fee of $100,000, an amount more than equal to the Governor's salary for sixteen years. The question whether he would have been so employed had he not been seated in the elevated chair of the Governor, brings out the whole point at issue. It is one of propriety merely when civil cases are involved; in criminal cases the point would be different. As the Governor has the power of pardon, it is obvious that should he choose to take criminal practice he could monopolize it. An attorney able to promise clients immunity from the rope and penitentiary would, naturally, have no competitors. Mr. Budd, as Governor, would hardly, by refusing a pardon, put Mr. Budd, the lawyer, in the position of having defended a guilty man, in the thinkable contingency of his client being convicted.

President Cleveland is a lawyer. Should he walk from the White House to the Supreme Court and appear as an attorney there, the public would deem his conduct scandalous. Yet it would be precisely parallel to that of the Governor of California.

The illustration suffices. Governor Budd should control his appetite for fees until his official term has expired.

The Debate On the Queen's Speech. That the Venezuelan question is not likely to create any further ill-feeling between this country and England is clearly indicated by the debate in Parliament over the Queen's speech. It should be well understood that the address from the throne at the opening of Parliament is an outline of the policy and the principal measures which the party in power proposes to support. The Ministry, and not the Sovereign personally, is responsible for this deliverance. The debate upon the speech, much more than the document itself, brought out a strong showing of friendliness towards the United States. And, setting sentiment aside, it appears to be the policy of both the great parties in England to recognize the Monroe doctrine. In fact, the speech of Sir William Vernon Harcourt, a Liberal leader, supports the doctrine in the most unequivocal terms. He defined it as being nothing more than a limitation to the American continents of the principle which in Europe is recognized as essential to the preservation of the balance of power. Hence the only practical question remaining between the two Governments is whether the doctrine has been invaded in the case of Venezuela. This is a question of fact, rather than of policy, as it turns upon the matter of boundary. It is refreshing to find that Balfour, in replying for the Ministry to the criticisms contained in Harcourt's speech, took pains to disclaim any intention or desire, on the part of the Tory Government, to object to the Monroe doctrine. He even recognized it as of British origin, and declared he could see no reason why it should be criticised. He insisted that there had never been the slightest intention on the part of the Government to violate the substance or essence of the Monroe Doctrine, and he said that the Government had promised to give to the American Venezuelan Commission all the information it could furnish. Lord Salisbury followed in much the same vein, and concluded his reference to the Venezuelan question with the remark that the Government is "rightly relying on the question of arbitration." These outlines of the speech-making in Parliament indicate that Great Britain is gracefully backing down on the Venezuelan matter. There is a striking contrast between the present reliance of Salisbury on arbitration and his former refusal to consent to that method of adjusting the dispute, on the suggestion of the United States. The vigorous assertion of the Monroe Doctrine in President Cleveland's message, followed by the apprehensions of trouble in the Transvaal and with Germany, have evidently done much to open the eyes of English statesmen to a perception of the merits of arbitration. The moral force of the conclusions reached by the American Commission will be so great that it should have, in effect, all the results that would follow the award of an International Board of Arbitration. It is quite certain that, so far as the Government of this country is concerned, the findings of the Commission will be conclusive as to the question of boundary. Should England attempt to occupy and hold more territory than the Commission finds to be her due, there will be fresh cause of offense to the United States.

The Growth of The Drug Habit. The prevalence of the medicine habit in San Francisco is indicated by the large number of drug stores, and the extent to which various nostrums are advertised in the newspapers. But this city is probably not peculiar in its inordinate consumption of medicines. Dosing is national in its manifestations, and may almost be called an American vice. There should be less of it in California, and particularly in San Francisco, than in any other State in the Union, population considered, but it is doubtful if the salubrity of our climate tends materially to limit the trade of the apothecaries. Most of our people live generously; a large proportion of them fail to take sufficient exercise out of doors, and the great majority of those who suffer the natural consequences of over-eating and insufficient oxygenation resort to "liver pills," laxatives, cathartics, purgatives, tonics, sedatives, nerve-foods, quinine, iron, or other remedies, according to the fancy of the victim. Jones' pill, Brown's compound, or Robinson's bitters, each has its own devotees; whatever is best advertised being commonly the most in demand. Of late years the consumption of tonics and so-called nerve-foods has assumed enormous proportions; to such an extent, in fact, is it carried that many grocers now keep in stock one or more of the most popular compounds of this class. A multitude of nervous people, suffering from overwork, anxiety, too close attention to business, or from dissipation of some sort, take to phosphates or hypophosphites, to bromides, caffeine and other sedatives; or some of their compounds. Nervous impairment is, indeed, too common, but any capable physician would tell the neurotic subject that no chemical product is equal in value, for the nutrition of the nervous system, to such simple foods as roast beef, fresh butter, or cracked wheat and cream. A doctor in San Francisco, who is deservedly eminent for his skill in the treatment of nervous diseases, is authority for the statement that corn bread, well soaked with good butter, is a better nerve food than can be found on the shelves of any drug store. But such is the fascination that drugs and nostrums have for the average man or woman that the most learned and most experienced of physicians and pathologists may lecture in vain on the folly of the popular resort to medicine, to the neglect of proper habits of living and reasonable restriction of the diet to simple and wholesome foods. Some months ago, in this city, a victim of the drug habit was put upon a milk diet, with an entire absence of medicine, and the results were astonishing to himself as well as to his friends. His insomnia and other nervous troubles disappeared, and he gained twenty pounds in weight. The case illustrates the superiority of hygiene over mere medication, though it is not to be denied that much may be sometimes accomplished by the skilled administration of drugs, in connection with other remedial measures.

Chronic Kickers. It is a sign of the times that the papers generally are not attacking the corporations with their usual vigor and steadfastness of purpose. This has probably been brought about by an understanding of the fact that attacking corporations, merely because they are such, is no way to build up the State nor to further the interests of its inhabitants. The Spring Valley Water Company has been peculiarly free from these attacks lately, presumably owing to the publication of a statement showing that their gains during the last year were not such as to excite the envy of the proprietors of the daily journals. In the last financial statement of the Company, read and vouched for by Charles Webb Howard, the following figures appear:

" " " of City and County	137,235 73
" Waste Fines and Other Sources.....	21,163 65
	$ 1,707,234 15
The Expenditures were as follows:
For Operating Expenses.....	$ 376,825 72
" Taxes.....	102,154 84
" Interest.....	533,738 14
Dividends Paid	711,000 00
	$ 1,723,718 70

These figures, then, show a difference of over $16,000 between the receipts and the expenditures, the difference being on the side of the losses. Yet, in spite of this, dividends have been paid to holders of stock, proving cautious and responsible management, and the water rate has been steadily and considerably lowered.

Taking these facts into consideration, and bearing in mind the standing of the men at the head of the institution, it seems only just that the general baiting of the company by every irresponsible journal in the State should cease. A country cannot be built up by attacking solid concerns and the people whose interests are one with those of the general public. The very people who make such great outcry are probably doing little themselves to bring about an amelioration of the conditions they so bitterly denounce.

The New Post Office. There is a gang of fellows who are still scolding because the United States Government doesn't carry out the nefarious scheme of building a new Postoffice at least a mile distant from and convenient locality. It is bad enough where it is now, but the longer the Secretary of the Treasury keeps the gang from realizing its plans, and the people are not compelled to submit to the inconvenience of being swindled, the better chance there will be for common honesty to hold up its head.

Elements of Our Foreign Trade. The remarkable success of the late offer of Government bonds should not blind the people of this country to the continuance of the evils resulting from the bad condition of our monetary system. While it is gratifying to find such popular confidence in the stability of the Government's credit, and of its intention and ability to redeem its obligations in gold, the fact should not be lost sight of that under the existing conditions gold will continue to drain out of the country. It has been shown that the trade balance against the United States, in transactions with foreign countries, amounts to something like $250,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year. This has to be made up either in the sale of American securities abroad or by exportation of gold. And so long as any doubt or uncertainty remains with respect to the preservation of a parity between our gold and silver money, there will be a disposition on the part of banks and brokers to hoard gold. Consequently, what is required for export will be withdrawn from the United States Treasury, through the conversion of greenbacks or Treasury notes into coin. Were this country permanently relieved of the silver question, gold would go more freely into circulation, and the sale of American securities would serve to adjust international balances, with but little need for the exportation of specie. Another prime remedial agent would be an extension of the free trade policy, so as to increase our exports. The protectionist notion that free trade would mean a great increase in imports, with a corresponding decline of exports, is a pure delusion, conclusively disproved by the experience of England after her adoption of the free trade policy. In reality, what hampers our manufacturers and producers more than any thing else, in their competition for foreign trade, is the burden imposed on them by our protective tariff. This is particularly true with relation to raw materials. Another truth, essential for our people to learn, is that there can be little expansion of our foreign trade without a corresponding increase of imports. Trade is an exchange of commodities. We cannot sell to any great extent where we do not buy, save in respect to those products of our soil which are needed for the consumption of countries less favored in an agricultural way. In the exportation of cereals, however, we must remember that we are impoverishing our own soil, to the detriment of future prosperity. If our California wheat growers, for example, were obliged to restore to the soil each year, in fertilizers, an equivalent for the elements permanently withdrawn in the annual crop of wheat, they would find themselves out of pocket as a result of their industry. Sooner or later these impoverishing drafts on the soil must be made good. For these reasons we should not felicitate ourselves upon our large exports of breadstuffs, but should aim to diminish them, and to substitute for them, in foreign trade, horticultural products and manufactured articles of various sorts, such as may be here produced to better advantage than in those countries with which we aim to deal.

Arm Chair Warriors. It would be a good thing for those patriotic gentlemen who sit snugly ensconced in their arm chairs and make vehement clamor for war, to forward their brains to some surgeon of repute for inoculation with some small amount of gray matter. This having been satisfactorily accomplished there will be some possibility of their viewing the present defenses of this nation as they really are and of reconsidering their late jingo utterances.

To conduct a war to a successful finish three things are absolutely necessary; money, ships, and well equipped men. Great Britain, against whom these same long distance fighters direct their deadly verbiage, is well supplied with all three. The man who will aver that we are in the same condition is either a knave or an ass so befuddled with patriotic sentiment as to be unfit for communion with his clearer sighted fellows. Money we undoubtedly have, and were it possible for us to huy up at the last minute first rate war-ships and hire Hessians to do our bidding, we might be in a position to defy any invader. But the days of hired soldiers are no more and it is presumable that the enemy would seek to supplant us in the matter of available ironclads. We must therefore rely upon our own resources, and these are not such as to cause the heart of a well balanced individual to beat with animated and self satisfied admiration. Commodore Sicard states that with the exception of a few cruisers, and some battleships in course of construction, we have no available navy whatever, and he recommends as an imperious necessity the construction of more ironclads. Incidentally he remarks that from five to six years will be necessary for the building of each one of these boats. What may happen in the meanwhile is obvious. The outlook therefore is certainly dubious from that standpoint. Our standing army, though presumably effective, is exceedingly small and the militia, as at present organized and equipped, might prove more troublesome than effective in the field. When our navy is equal, if not superior, to any two combined navies of Europe; when our regular army is placed on a proper war footing and our militia is robbed of its gaudy plumage and equipped with modern arms and is properly officered, then—and not till then—shall we be in a position to talk about war. In the meanwhile it is mere braggadocio.

New Mexico To the Front. The ministers of New Mexico can apparently pride themselves upon belonging to the better class of the people of that State. They awoke, not too quickly, to the expectant disgraceful onset into their country of the self-styled champions of the prize ring, and the legion of characterless scoundrels who follow closely at their heels. The gentlemen aforesaid happily concluded that it would be no special glory to them to have it said that theirs was the only community in the United States where the laws of decency were without support in the statute books and in the character of its citizens. It is to their everlasting credit that a gap in the statutes of the United States, making slogging a crime, was speedily and effectively filled. So many members of that highly extolled profession have so recently made themselves infamously prominent by reason of their weaknesses and sins, that such an exhibition of practical morality will serve to raise the level of the whole brotherhood. If a few members of the Ministerial Union, who have done such good work in New Mexico, will put their bundles on their sticks, and walk into our State, the chances are that some of the vain and feeble incumbents of our pulpits may be induced to step down and out, and allow a draught of pure morality to pass through the churches, and clear the atmosphere.

The English Laureate. Before Alfred Austin was appointed Poet Laureate, it is very doubtful if he knew that he was a great poet. By the appointment he gained many readers, and, doubtless, much current gold. Then the few who knew of William Watson's verses on Wordsworth's grave and his elegy on Tennyson, told every body else. So Watson became eminent without the risk of criticism that Austin endures and suffers from, and Austin has become the more eminent by his inferiority to Watson. Austin must write, and, being hopelessly weak, continuously reveals his own lack of strength. Watson, with a happy leisure, a healthy aspiration, and greater ability, as continuously writes, and as continuously, by comparison, makes Austin's inferiority immortal. Though the latter he Poet Laureate, the Fates bring to his master in song the laurel wreaths his genius weaves, and endear him daily more and more in the hearts of the people he sings to.

A Grave Question. When Prince Louis of Savoy sailed into port on the Christoforo Colombo, Mayor Sutro was thrown into a terrible state of mind. He perspired while trying to decide whether he should call on the Prince or wait for the Prince to call on him. Considering that the Mayor was here before Prince Louis came, and that the latter arrived without invitation, and appeared not officially, but as a Lieutenant of the Italian navy, a Mayor with an American soul would have intrenched himself at the City Hall and let His Highness do his worst. Besides, it is not known that Prince Louis wanted to see Mr. Sutro. Consequently, the visit of the Mayor to the royal Italian may or may not have afforded pleasure. However, as Louis is young and knocking around the world to gratify his curiosity, it is to be presumed that our pale and trembling Chief Magistrate contributed to his amusement.

THE SCANDAL IN THE FIRST PAROXYSMAL CHURCH.

THERE was trouble in the First Paroxysmal Church. It was all on account of the pastor. And yet all the lady members had thought him such a "dear good man."

No one would have suspected it. For the pastor was, if any fault could be found, a little too severe in his views. He made his congregation toe the mark in matters of church discipline.

"Keep off the grass of frivolity," he used to say in his much admired sermons. "No wandering from the straight and narrow path. Never dally by the wayside, but press on to the glorious hereafter, while Virtue leads the way. Shun the allurements of Vice."

The secular newspapers—Oh, so secular!—"sprung," as their ungodly reporters termed it, the sensation on the public. A news-monger with a kodak—horrible to relate!—had worked the mischief. And so the church was rent in twain.

It was an awful Sabbath, the day that a lascivious sheet appeared with the dreadful story of the good man's alleged fall from grace. And the cuts—they were so shocking! There was the picture of the pastor and his companion entering the side door of a hotel—alas, but too well known. And there were other pictures. But the "story" itself, ah, that was scandalous beyond limit! To say that it was a rude shock to the sensibilities of the congregation would be to put the fact all too feebly.

But the pastor was equal to the emergency. "Will he preach to-day?" was the question, but he did not for a moment hesitate. The church was crammed to the doors when he appeared in his usual place upon the platform. There was an intense stillness when he arose and gave out the hymn. After the singing, his prayer was unusually fervent, with particular unction for the salvation of the wicked. The sermon that followed was a disappointment. There was no allusion in it to the sensation of the day.

"He is innocent," declared most of the women on their way home from the sacred edifice.

"What marvelous nerve!" exclaimed the others, who knew him better.

However, they all said there would have to be an investigation. So did the deacons. But it was distinctly understood there should be no "trial." By no means. A trial would imply that the pastor was under suspicion. What was in reality to be investigated was the scandalizing and salacious press. The pastor, as every church member admitted, was entitled to be regarded as innocent until proven guilty.

"I shall abandon none of my rights," said the pastor, proudly. And he prescribed the method which the deacons should follow in conducting the investigation of the newspaper that was to be placed upon trial.

When the investigation was at last opened, one brother offered to submit the series of original photographs as evidence. This proposal was indignantly denounced by a prominent deacon.

"There was never such a thing heard of in the church," he declared. "The pictures might easily have been fabricated by the hell-boru newspaper that has poured out this nastiness on the public. You might as well attempt to offer the evidence of the hell-bound reporter himself, who was paid to write the infamous slander."

Then came a pause, while everybody waited to hear what some apologist for the press might have the hardihood to say.

"Is there anything to be offered in extenuation or excuse for the newspaper that has committed this outrage?" solemnly asked the presiding deacon.

The journal in question was represented only by a ribald reporter on the steps outside, in company with the other newsgatherers detailed for the occasion. There was no answer to the question, and presently another deacon moved a vote of censure on the offending publication. The sheet was declared to be unfit for admission to the home circle.

After a vote of entire confidence in the pastor, and of sympathy with him in the distress brought upon him by the licentious and scandal-mongering press, it was decided to increase his salary by one thousand dollars for the coming year.

As for the sensational newspaper, it never printed a retraction, but jeered in its coarse and brutal way at the manner in which the investigation was conducted. There were whispers in the congregation, but all the members feared to incur the displeasure of the pastor.

And he is preaching yet, at the old stand.

AS Carlina's day broke bright and fair, we were all forewarned of disastrous weather. The sagacious ground hog made no mistake this time, for no sooner had Monday dawned than the snow began falling in such immense flakes that every one looked for a blizzard. In the afternoon it moderated, and on Tuesday those fortunate ones who seized their opportunity got a few hours of sleighing before the rain storm set in and turned the snow to slush. Colonel Waring's celebrated white-clad street sweepers worked diligently day and night, and the streets have been comparatively clean.

I suppose echoes have reached you of the storm of discussion which was raised when Colonel Waring insisted upon arraying his street cleaners in white duck. But he insisted, and it must be said that when their garments are fresh from the hands of the unfortunate wives, whose weekly wash has been greatly increased by their adoption, they look very smart indeed. But a few hours of contact with mud and dust robs them of their immaculate appearance. The Parisian street cleaners, who keep that city the cleanest in the world, are attired in the blue blouses common among the peasantry, and never look anything but clean, no matter how vile the weather. There is no sign of the weather abating, and the shipowners have been warned of probable disasters.

The St. Paul came steaming into her dock on Wednesday, after her week on the sands at Long Branch, and is apparently none the worse for her disaster. Scarcely was she off than a British ship, the Lamington, grounded on Long Island, positively plunging into the sands. The crew were happily saved, but the ship lies in a dangerous position. Ocean travel, however, does not suffer. The Touraine brought over Mrs. Mackay on Saturday. She went to the Buckingham at once, and later joined Mr. Mackay and her son Clarence at their beautiful apartments in the Belgravia on Fifth avenue. Her sad journey was made for the purpose of bringing over the body of her son, who was taken to Greenwood on Tuesday, followed only by the family and two or three most intimate friends. Mrs. Mackay will return almost immediately to London, unless there should be some at present unforeseen change in her plans.

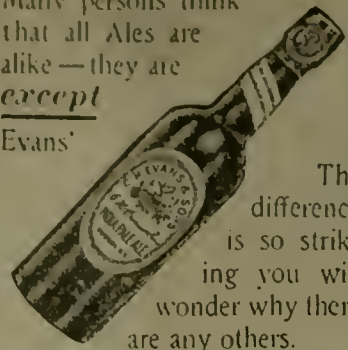

Russell J. Wilson is at the Holland House, and Mrs. George Hearst at the Waldorf. Hugo Toland is at the Imperial, where have been also Colonel and Mrs. James Elverson during the past week.

Captain J. Henry Whitney, father of Caspar Warrington Whitney, died a few days ago, after a short illness. He was well known in California for many years. His son, who has made so famous a name for himself, is, I think, a native son. He was a student for three or four years at St. Matthew's Hall, San Mateo, and looks back with great pleasure on his boyhood in the Golden State.

Michael Banner (do you remember him as an infant prodigy, when he used to study with clever old Padovani?) is frequently spoken of here. He is recognized as a leading violinist, and has made a position for himself not only in the artistic but also in the social world, where he is received as friend as well as artist. Leopold Lichtenberg is another San Francisco lad who has a metropolitan renown. He is instructor in the National Conservatory, works hard, and is serious and ambitious.

The musical world is excited over the prospect of hearing once more the Thomas orchestra. For the first time in years Thomas will conduct in New York, and a testimonial in the form of a gift of silver is being prepared for him. Rafael Joseffy is promised as a soloist at his first concert, a treat one anticipates with enthusiasm, as he has not appeared for a long time on the concert stage. Mme. Rive-King has also been in semi-seclusion as a concert pianiste, only now and then emerging from the quiet of her home to delight her hearers on some special occasion. She lives in Brooklyn, where she receives a few advanced pupils, and devotes her time almost entirely to them.

Lieutenant Wisser, who was so long at Fort Hamilton with Captain Dillenbeck, has been transferred to Fortress Munroe. Captain Dillenbeck has again been laid up with a touch of malarial fever.

Dr. Malcolm Toland Sime, who took his degree in medicine only last autumn, has become associated as junior partner with D. Goelet, one of the most prominent physicians in New York—a splendid opening for a young practitioner.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Alexander have been amongst those energetically working to keep Ballington Booth and his wife in America in opposition to the "General's" order that they be transferred to England. Both Mr. and Mrs. Booth are greatly beloved here, and a splendid tribute to their work was the monster mass meeting at Carnegie Hall. Clergymen of all denominations, together with prominent laymen, showed by their presence and their voices the sincerity of their appreciation of the work accomplished by the Salvation Army in this city. What a contrast between the revivings of a few years ago and the applause of to-day. The Salvation Army is no longer a joke—it is a magnificent monument to Christianity.

A STRANGE spectacle greeted the eye at the California on Monday night. Rigid, stark, within the narrow confines of the chairs; dadoing the side walls and clustering between the parted curtains in the foyer, in its full number and impressiveness, was that bogie of the venturesome manager, terror of Tanquerays, and general combination of ice chest and crematory so fearful to itself and so intensely speculative to its entertainers—the noble army of San Francisco first-nighters. It neither gleamed nor glowered; but calmly expectant, cramped yet reposed, and somberly clad, it sat a stolid, squat bank of pallid shirt bosoms framed in the drapery of feminine sleeve, apparently pulseless as rock, and silent as the desert. On the dimly lighted stage, before the piano, sat Ignace J. Paderewski playing the opening bars of the allegro of Beethoven's C major sonata. His stock of lemon hair; his pale, pasty face, wan and dreamful; his vague, shadowy eyes; his coat tails hanging through the back of the chair like long, black tail feathers; his lean legs thrust forward and his feet beating nervously at the pedals, gave one the impression of some great, uncanny bird. As he finished the first movement he bowed indifferently to the moderate enthusiasm of its reception. It was Beethoven—the King. But Beethoven on the piano does not evoke the full possibilities of the instrument. Even Liszt admitted as much. The broad, rich tones of the adagio then answered the pent silence. Notes so clear, so gurglingly liquid, so full of the passionate thrill of strings, the downy caress of reeds and the humid sweetness of the flute, that one forgets the ivory keys and the mechanism from which they leap, and the hands of steel and velvet which lure them forth. Paderewski holds his imagination in his hands. It is the ideal of technique and temperament, where every muscle and sinew responds to the poetry of the brain. It is Beethoven still; Beethoven on the piano. But the tone, the marvelous combinations of color! The note that sobs as from a throat, and then throbs as if poised on a human heart! It must have been this great deaf master heard within his mind when the notes dropped from his pen.

The final movement lost all suggestion of complexity or technical difficulty as its fleeting twinings and inter-twinings found form and thought in Paderewski's playing. The melodic beauty of the themes and the rare contour of their treatment were definitely and convincingly interpreted. Then broke the storm of applause, and Paderewski added San Francisco to his conquests.

It is not surprising that Paderewski's programmes should consist largely of Chopin. Poetic delicacy of temperament, warmth of imagination, and the indescribable blend of passion and ecstacy unite the virtuoso and the composer by closer ties than their brotherhood as Poles. Vladimir de Pachman was the greatest Chopin player that had come to us before Paderewski. He had the refinement, the emotional quality and the wooing touch, but he lacked the virile breadth that is the backbone of music; the disciplined strength that is the secret of the cat's soft, unerring tread. Paderewski plays Chopin with a delicacy that, at times, is almost effeminate; but there is the large, unmistakable gentleness of the man underlying all its tenderness. He plays Beethoven in the full sweep and dignity of its superb grandeur, and Schuman and Liszt, he has shown us (up to the time of writing), are equally well rendered by those boundless hauds. And when a man plays these works and plays them as Paderewski does, his ability to cope with anything in piano-forte literature must be conceded.

If the contemporaneous records of the musical world speak truthfully, Paderewski is the greatest pianist living to-day. Removed, as we are, so far from the art centres of the world, we must rely, to a large extent, on the critical estimate of the older, and more musically environed cities, where, by comparison, the rank of virtuosi may be more accurately established than by us whose opportunities for the world's greatest are seldom and spasmodic. For my own part I would rather have the verdict of New York on a question of musical preëminence than that of any other city, for the very reason of its opportunities for comparison. New York is prodigal with the golden bait, consequently nearly every thing of note in the musical world is lured to its shores. New York proclaims Paderewski foremost of pianists. Having heard no better ourselves, we do wisely in concurring and enjoying to our utmost a feast that may not come again for many a moon.

It was with no small provincial pride that I read the criticisms of the opening concert in our great dailies on Tuesday morning. There was such a happy unanimity of opinion, so positive and unequivocal that a deaf man would have been convinced of Paderewski's right to wear the crown. The Examiner, in particular, I could not but contrast with its issue of a week previous wherein an Italian, an Englishman and an American had been employed to review an operatic production. The result was that the three classes of people interested—the managers, the artists and the audience—were each deeply felicitated. My joy, as a portion of the audience, in the patriotic perusal of my fair countrywoman's critique was keen enough to mollify whatever unhappiness I may have felt at the equal success, for their respective clients, of Britain and Italy.

Even in this end-of-the-century day there is much that may be admired in the old school of the legitimate, but the star with a supporting company that attains only the dignity of "props," belongs to a by-gone age. Mr. Keene is the entire performance at the California. He receives a mild aid from Miss Belgarde, but, beyond her, it might as well be a duet with the prompter. If you go to the California to see Thomas Keene in any of the characters that have established him on the middle plane of American tragedians, you will be rewarded for your pains with a piece of strong, earnest acting on the rugged, semi-melodramatic lines that characterized Melpomene's mummers in your father's day; if you go for a complete performance of the divine tragedies, you will find it not. Little that is new can be written about Keene in the rôles that have made him familiar to every theatre-goer in the land. He has softened some—maybe the tide of modernity has grazed even his heavily-grained personality; maybe advancing years have mellowed a strength once too rude to be artistic. At all events, Keene of to-day is an interesting, and, in a measure, intellectual an actor. His Richard is a remarkable conception in many ways, and his Louis XI., as played on Tuesday night, is a careful, convincing study of an exacting character. And he does not make speeches before the curtain—a form of restrained eloquence in which he shines luminous among the tragedians that visit us.

I have often said in these columns that the most critical music audience in this city is the body that patronizes the Carr-Beel concerts—also that these concerts had developed, by the process of rendering the highest class of chamber-music, its devotees to a point of culture that made symphonies possible in San Francisco; besides generally raising the standard of excellence for solo and ensemble string work. In spite of several counter attractions Golden Gate Hall was fairly well attended on Saturday afternoon. Mozart's beautifully melodious quintet for clarinet and strings was given a graceful, finished reading; the largetto movement in particular being rendered with commendable verve and sympathy. Miss Marion Taylor sang two Russian folk songs and songs by Grieg and Mascagni, every note of each number succeeding in eluding the key by a cacophonous fraction of an interval which showed that tone-deafness is not confined to Mr. Du Maurier's heroine, even though Svengali's genius in mastering it is not shared by the great Marchesi—from whom, I believe Miss Taylor received extensive instruction. The Godard trio in F and Mr. Kent's Fantasia Stuke (Niels Gade) on the clarinet completed three excellent instrumental numbers.

The operas have been running along to a generous patronage at the Baldwin. Cavalleria Rusticana and I Pagliacci have been the most distinctive performances, no little credit belonging to Herr Martens' orchestra, which was in capital spirit with the modernity and dramatic tend of the works. Dorre's Santuzza, like her Carmen, is decidedly volcanic, and her indefatigable work and the splendid support of the orchestra made the performance one of special interest—which is more than may be said of Lohengrin, or even Verdi's hand-organ master piece, Traviata. Pagliacci was distinctive through Guille's Cunio—a part that prescient nature seems to have had in mind when giving him his form and inches. Guille was dramatic to the highest degree, and though his tenor did not ring with its old time glory, the great scene at the close of the first act was intense and absorbing. Mlle. Lichter has not the pulse for Nedda, but she sang melodiously and gave the little tenor a passable foil.

My Partner, another of Campbell's melodramas, and one of the most successful ever written in this country, has been the bill at Morosco's Grand Opera House this week. It is an impressive picture of early Californian days, full of well-worked climaxes, splendidly mounted, and in the hands of Morosco's players it has had a good, even performance. Butler did exceptionally well with Joe Saunders, Brinker made a strong "partner," Swain's Chinaman was admirably sustained, and Miss Hall's Mary Brandon was invested with a delightful womanhood and grace.

John A. Steven's thrilling and picturesque play, Wife for Wife, is announced for presentation next week on an elaborate scale.

There are several new specialties at the Orpheum this week, notably Tina Corri, an English male impersonator, who shows that sex inversion is not limited to soft-voiced man, and that it is a much healthier spectacle to see a woman in trousers than a man in skirts and corsets. The Garrisons do a neat travesty, and the Pantzer brothers an amazing head-balancing act. Carroll Johnson and Rachel Walker are still among the favorites.

Grover's Alcazar has seen a good presentation of Bartley Campbell's old melodrama, The White Slave, this week. Anita Fallon was excellent as Daphne, Miss Gleason made a great deal out of the name part, and Powers was effectively strong as the slave dealer; in fact, Fanny Young, Josephine Gassman, and the entire company did very creditably with the old piece.

The Tavery Company's farewell week at the Baldwin will be given to the operas that have proved the strongest attractions during the last two weeks. Monday, The Huguenots; Tuesday, Lohengrin; Wednesday matinee, Mignon; Wednesday night, Lucia and Cavalleria; Thursday, Faust; Friday, Bohemian Girl; Saturday matinee, Carmen, and Saturday night, Traviata. Frederick Warde and his excellent company follows.

The coming week presents Alfred Edward's dramatization of Faust at the Alcazar. Percy Hunting has been engaged for the character of Mephisto, supported by the full strength of Grover's company. New scenery and wonderful electrical effects are among the attractions promised. On February 24th the Carleton Opera Company commences a season at this house.

Thomas Keene's repertory for next week at the California is: Merchant of Venice on Monday night and Saturday matinee; Richard III. on Tuesday and Saturday nights; Richelieu Wednesday, Hamlet Thursday, Othello Friday, and Louis XI. Sunday. After Keene comes jolly Nelly McHenry and her new cyclo-comedy, The Bicycle Girl.

Next Monday evening, for the first time in five years, Von Weber's famous German romantic opera, Der Freischütz, or The Seven Charmed Bullets, will be sung at the Tivoli Opera House. The production, it is promised, will be the finest ever given in this city.

Paderewski gives three matinees next week, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

Katie Putnam a bright and clever comedienne, opens a two weeks' engagement at the Columbia Monday night, presenting for the first time here The Old Lime Kiln, a new play by C. T. Dazey, author of In Old Kentucky. In Old Kentucky was written for Katie Putnam, but as she did not consider it suited to her style of work, Mr. Dazey wrote The Old Lime Kiln as a substitute.

At the Columbia, Corinne and her jolly extravaganza have duplicated the success of the first week at the California. The Nichols Sisters do a bit of negro speciality which is the cleverest thing in its line that we have had in years.

will bless our efforts as we have blessed the others for theirs.

Who wonders that the name of James D. Phelan is wrought in unfading letters upon the heart of each Native Son? For it is he to whom they owe this imposing structure. He it is who has done, and does, so much for this State. He it is whose name heads every enterprise where its welfare is concerned. He it is who is honored by all, and loved by so many, for the things he does and whose active mind is ever engaged in thinking out schemes for the good of California. Mr. Phelan is President of the Hall Association and he may be well proud of the work so lately accomplished.

The other officers of the Hall Association are Lewis F. Byington, Vice President; and Adolph Eberhart, the popular and indefatigable Secretary.

Frank H. Dunne, Grand President of the Order, a young attorney and former Justice of the Peace, has also done much both by his labors and advice to further the necessary completions of this new building. He took a prominent part in the recent dedicatory ceremonies.

Another man whose name is closely connected with the Order, and who has pushed himself to the front to help it along is John H. Grady, a leading real estate and insurance broker at No. 323 Montgomery street. Like Mr. Sproul, California is all in all to him and he worked untiringly to perfect the organization of which he has been a member since it was first started. He also has been an officer in the Order and is now a Past Grand President. He was the Chairman of the Building Committee and upon his shoulders fell much of the responsibility necessarily attaching to such a position. He also is well known to the Sons.

men, loyal to their State; with only its interests at heart, and determined to stand by it in sunshine and in gloom until time ends all things.

But such is nevertheless the case; and as you stand on Mason street and look up at that massive structure before you, with its five solid stories of granite and marble and brick; when you go inside and see its superb finishings, its beautiful hall where the voice sounds as clear as a silver bell; when you stand in the impressive lodge rooms, so magnificently furnished and so silent, then you slowly become aware of the fact that California is indeed great, and that her Native Sons are capable of making her greater and grander yet. The sight of that building, so rich in suggestions of the past and the future, is enough to make the bosom of the beholder expand with righteous pride. It stands for California in the aggregate; and some day, when the Order will contain the names of not alone ten thousand members but even one hundred thousand, all working together in the interests of this mighty and richly endowed State, then the young men who stand together beneath the banner of the bear will look back to these days as we look back to that June 29th, twenty years ago, and they

A gentleman whose name is dear to the younger element of this State is Jo D. Sproul, a Past Grand President of the Order, and a man who is known to every Son enrolled in it. Few men have displayed so much active interest in the affairs of the Order; few have won the general good will of so many members; few of the gentlemen who have served as officers have performed their services so faithfully and so efficiently; few will receive such hearty and such sincere good wishes as he. Mr. Sproul is now practicing law in Chico, and, as he is at the head of his profession and makes hosts of friends, should have no difficulty in coming in for a fair share of this world's goods. He laid the corner stone at the opening ceremonies on Sunday and led the audience in prayer, his language being choice in expression and suitable to the occasion.

One of the gentlemen who is much interested in the Order is H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, a Grand Trustee and Director and who has also held other responsible positions in the past. He is a member of Bay City Lodge and is now Presiding Officer of the Library and Reading Room Association. He was also Assemblyman for the 39th District. By profession Mr. Dinkelspiel is a lawyer. is well known to the members of the San Francisco Bar and has a large and lucrative practice. His office is in the Chronicle Building, Room 42, Third Floor.

George D. Clark is one of the well-known members of Pacific Parlor No. 10. He has done much to further the interests of the Native Sons and has held high position among them, the post of Grand Lecturer being one of the most honorable and to be desired. He is the secretary and treasurer of the firm of N. Clark & Sons, manufacturers and dealers in sewer pipe, etc., 17-19 Spear street.

Joseph E. O'Donnell, a Past President of Yerba Buena Parlor No. 84 of San Francisco is another gentleman well known to the Native Sons, in whose behalf he has long worked untiringly. He was the orator upon the occasion of laying the foundation stone for the new Hall on February 25th, 1895. By profession Mr. O'Donnell is a lawyer, and a member of the law firm of Jones & O'Donnell, 14 Sansome street, one of the most prominent firms in this city. Although both the partners are comparatively young men, they come in for their fair share of big cases and usually carry them through to a successful finish. Moreover Mr. O'Donnell has the honor to act as Special Counsel for the City and County of San Francisco. He has acted in this capacity for the last seven years, having been appointed by various Boards of Supervisors irrespective of political complexion. This is saying a great deal and the Native Sons have good reason to be proud of having him in their ranks.

Milton D. Garratt is also a well known member and Grand Trustee of the Native Sons. Mission Parlor No. 38 is the one to which he belongs. He is a Past Grand President and holds office at present, being President of the Board of Directors of Mission Parlor Hall. Mr.

Garratt is a member of the firm of W. T. Garratt & Co., corner Fremont and Natoma streets. Their foundry is one of the largest on this coast and the things they manufacture would puzzle the average person even to find the right names for. Most of our big bells and gongs and steam whistles are of their manufacture, as well as fire hydrants, all sorts of pumps, water and gas gates and many other big things. To go over their works on the corner of Fifth and Brannan streets is an instructive treat in itself. The firm is an old and a reliable one.

Mr. L. M. Bannan, a charter member and Past President of Sequoia Parlor, and member of the Board of Directors, of the Hall Association acted in the capacity of Chairman of the Reception committee at the dedication exercises.

Henry Lundstedt, the Grand Secretary is another gentleman whose name and efforts will ever be remembered by the Native Sons.

Although everybody is interested in a large building like this one, very few know how it is constructed and who the men are, who, by their individual efforts finally give us the glorious, completed whole. And so we will go carefully into each detail and give due credit where credit most assuredly belongs.

The first man who has anything to do with a building is the architect. A.

C. Lutjens is the gentleman who devised the plans for our building. His office is in the Phelan Building, Rooms 125-127.

All the brick and granite work below the first floor of the building, and the corner stone, was furnished by the well-known firm of Liebert & Hoffmann, whose office is at the Builders' Exchange, 40 New Montgomery street. They also set the terra cotta and their work speaks for itself. Only the finest materials are in evidence. The committee who awarded the contracts unanimously agreed that the work could not have been done better and were glad that the contract went the way it did. Liebert & Hoffmann are masters at their work and as they have put up nearly all the big buildings in this city, as well as others in various big towns on the Coast, it is not to be wondered at that their work is so superior. Mr. Liebert is the builder of the Odd Fellows' Building at Napa, also the Napa Insane Asylum, a part of the Cooper Medical college, and a part of the New City Hall. His partner, Victor Hoffmann, among others, built the Drexler Building, the Doe Building, known as the St. Nicholas Hotel, the Sacramento Cathedral and the Sacramento Brewery and many other large and small buildings in this city. The firm, collectively, has erected the following: The Native Sons Building, the Ivancovich Building, the Curtaz Building, the Kohn Building and numerous others. No wonder their work is perfect.

Wrought Iron and Steel Work. All this work was done by the Western Iron Works, 123-125 Beale street. The firm is an old and a reliable one, having been established in 1852. They are manufacturers of all kinds of heavy building work, such as girders, roofs, railings, etc. They are also the sole makers of the Champion Metallic Wheelbarrow.

Perfect Plumbing. There is nothing so necessary in a modern building as perfect and sanitary plumbing. In fact it is a science, and the man who has it down best gets the work in all big buildings. In spite of brisk competition the firm of Allen & Looney of

The Marble Work. The marble used on the first floor is from Amador County and is as good as any in the world. It should be used in the construction of all buildings in the city. For the wainscoting especially it is admirable. It is imported by W. H. McCormick, of 17 City Hall avenue.

The Dazzling Stonework. The first thing that catches the eye is the stonework on the building. It is well executed and of a fine quality. The sidewalks in front of the building and the basement floors are of the same quality and look as if they will out last time. W. F. Ambrose, whose office is at 40 New Montgomery street, did all this work.

California Woods. The furniture in the different rooms and lodges of the building is of the finest oak, all made to order. Moreover it is all California wood. This furniture was supplied by Henry Hufschmidt, 1321 Market street. He also made the massive desks used in the lodges.

Like Nature's Sward. The carpets used throughout the building, in the lodge rooms, offices and parlors are all of the best body-Brussels in the latest designs and perfect in matching of figures. The colors have been admired by everyone who has seen them. They were supplied by Schlueter & Volberg, 709 Market street.

The Canopies. The Canopies in the lodge rooms over the altars, etc., were made by the California Furniture Company, 117-121 Geary street. These canopies are beautiful things of the richest velvets, of different dark rich hues and give a very impressive and magnificent aspect to the lodges.

H. G. W. DINKELSPIEL

314 O'Farrell street got this contract. The perfection of the lavatory and gasfitting work shows what masters of their art they are. Their reputation is known all over the city and the work they undertake, when complete, is guaranteed.

Carpentering and Roof Work. The carpentering work in the building proves that the man who executed it is a genius. Mr. F. A. Williams is the gentleman who receives the praise for this fine work. His office is in the Builders' Exchange, where he is one of the best known of its habitués. From the tower to the basement his work is admirable. He also did some of the galvanized iron work. Many of the best known buildings in this city have been erected under his careful supervision and he has also performed considerable work for the State Board of Harbor Commissioners.

Cutting and Carving Granite. This is exceedingly delicate work and demands that the most skilled workmen be employed. The Rae Building and Contracting Company undertook this responsible task and the work they have turned out is perfect in every respect. They furnished the granite and laid it. The firm consists of James Rae, President; R. McCann, Treasurer; J. P. M. Phillips; H. F. Whittle, Vice President; and F. Smith, Secretary. Their stone yard is on Seventh street, between Townsend and King.

WILL D. SHEA.

The Clear Plate Glass. That the massive plate, sheet and fine window glass should be of the best quality obtainable will be understood when one knows that it is supplied by W. P. Fuller & Co., of 21 and 23 Front street. This firm is known from San Diego to Washington and Oregon. The glass used in this building is as clear as crystal and speaks well for the firm's capabilities in this particular line.

Painting Material. The paints and varnishes used in the decoration of the interior and exterior of the building were supplied by that well-known house the Bass-Hueter Paint Co., Nos. 18, 20 and 22 Ellis street. This firm has been established since 1860, and during that period has furnished material for some of the finest buildings in California.

The Trimmings of The Building. This work was all done by one of the leading firms on this coast, A. Steiger Sons, 206 Market street. The firm is an enterprising one, Mr. Steiger having risen from a small manufacturer in 1862 to be the very head of his particular line of business. His business is now conducted by his sons. Their pottery is probably the completest in the United States. The plant covers eight acres and is modern in every respect. Their specialties are Architectural Terra Cotta, Hollow Tile, Fire Proofing and Pressed and Ornamental Bricks, Chimney and Sewer Piping, etc. This firm has rendered us independent of Eastern goods and should be patronized accordingly. The work on this building alone speaks for itself and proves that we can produce manufactures equal to any in the world and superior to much of the stuff that is sent us from the East.

Interior Decorations. The interior painting and decorative work of the building is superb. The woods used are natural hard woods, red wood, white cedar, and oak. The painting and tinting is the work of the artists Dutot & Gibson of 1005 Folsom street. Their work in this building has been pronounced excellent in every respect by people who ought to know.

The Passenger Elevator. The upper floors of the building are always easily accessible by the swift-running passenger elevator, located near the northern entrance. The committee having in charge, the selection of an elevator, decided that a Direct Electric would be most economical to operate, and selected the Cabill & Hall Elevator Company's Direct Electric Elevator as being the most suitable and best machine presented. Since the installation of the elevator, it has been proven that the committee's decision was correct, as the elevator is pronounced to be the finest on the Coast. It has a carrying capacity of 2200 pounds and can be regulated to travel at any speed up to 350 feet per minute, being the fastest direct electric elevator in the city. It is equipped with all the modern safety devices, is smooth running and noiseless, and is always under the control of the operator.

LIBRARY AND READING ROOM.

R. W. Martland, the genial Manager of the Hall has made himself popular by his continued efforts in behalf of the Order. Ever courteous to visitors, he makes friends of every one with whom he comes in contact.

Will D. Shea, a member of the well-known firm of Shea & Shea, the present architects of the New City Hall, is a Past President of California Parlor and acting in that capacity at present.

Mr. Shea has had much to do with the construction of buildings like the one we are writing of, having built the Mission Parlor Hall and also the Hall for Eden Parlor at Haywards.

It would not be right to forget to mention Charles Casassa, of California Parlor, who furnished the music at the ceremonies. He was the Director of the Exposition Band and helped make our Midwinter Fair the success it was. His is the only complete military band on the Coast and his music delights the promenaders in the Park every Sunday. Mr. Casassa was highly complimented by Sousa last spring.

The size of the hall in this building is ninety-nine by sixty four feet, making it the largest in the city. The main hall and some of the lodge rooms are to be let and will be very desirable indeed.

Adjoining the Native Sons' Building as depicted in our frontispiece, will be seen a good picture of the First Congregational Church, whose pastor is the somewhat notorious Dr. Brown.

The above short sketch will give our readers an idea of the leading spirits constituting this powerful and patriotic organization. It is the hope of everyone that it will continue to grow until it embraces within its ranks every Californian, and will ever be instrumental in furthering the interests of our fair and mighty State.

Rich Amador Gold Mines.

One of the most promising mining districts in California just now is in that section of Amador County situated between the town of Sutter Creek and Jackson, covering a distance of more than four miles along the celebrated "mother lode." Here are to be found some of the most promising and valuable gold mines in the State. With a massive and compact vein in the regular lode formation, a very fine class of ore is found, with the precious metal diffused throughout the quartz with a most pleasing uniformity. The pay streak ranges in width from a few inches to twenty or thirty feet, and the extreme downward trend is as yet undetermined, although work has already been successfully carried on at a depth of two thousand feet. According to some statistics, the average cost of mining and milling the ore in this locality is from about three dollars per ton, with an assay value ranging from five dollars upward. Among the prominent mines of this district is the Amador Consolidated, an old-time producer, which has been closed down, owing to the destruction of the shaft by fire. The ledge, at the time work stopped, was of great size, and the general average of the ore was high grade. The yield of the property, down to a depth of 2,200 feet, is placed at $20,000,000. The Central Eureka Mine, which adjoins the Amador Mine on the south, has a shaft down 700 feet, and a large amount of high-grade ore was extracted some years ago when the mine was last worked. Some Oakland and San Francisco capitalists who now own this ground are about to reopen it, and will carry the shaft down to the 900 level. Machinery has already been put in place capable of going down 2,000 feet. Adjoining this property is the South Eureka, owned by people in this city, which is now opened up to a depth of 1,050 feet. The showing on the 500, 730, and 900 foot levels is immense, the ore so far developed being valued at from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000. There is a twenty-stamp mill upon the property, which, it is said, will shortly be enlarged as regards the stamping capacity, to accommodate the increasing demands of the mine.

Comstock Mining Shares.

The course of the market for the week now closing, like so many others of late which preceded it, furnishes scant opportunity for comment. While little remains to be said of a favorable character, nothing has developed either in Nevada or on the street, which can be construed in an unfavorable light. A lack of energy among the members of the Exchange, who are getting almost as bad as their neighbors in the Chamber of Commerce, who invariably fall back upon a set of prosy old resolutions as the panacea for all ills which may befall the city, State, or nation. This has not helped themselves or anybody else very much during the past twenty years, and their example, while evidently contagious, is not so good as even the homely precept in this instance. The mines along the lode are all looking fairly well.

The Gold Exchange.

Arrangements are now being pressed to get the Gold Mining Exchange in operation, and it is hoped that within a fortnight everything will be in readiness to open up for business. The sooner it does so the better, for the sooner the cappers and "bilks," who now make the town odious to decent people in the business, will have to seek new pastures. Any mining man of the old school can detect these incubi at a glance. A walk along Montgomery street will take one through a crowd of these idle hangers-on, loaded down to the guards with bad whiskey and "prospectuses." All have had some connection in the past, which is now dragged to light for service as an introduction to some new arrival who looks like a fair "prospect." The mission of mischief to which these gentry have devoted in many cases a lifetime of beggary, or a close approach thereto, is about ended, and the Exchange, if its lines are broadened sufficiently for the purpose, can very appropriately drive the last nail in the coffin of a most dangerous and offensive nuisance.

Much Cry, No Wool.

The Hammond episode in the Transvaal embroglio has resulted about the way predicted in this column a few weeks ago, when the "innocents" in this outpost of Christianity were agitating the surroundings with heartrending appeals for the relief of one who, fortunately for himself, was in safer hands. It is only another case of "the Lord protect us from our friends," and precious few they would likely have been were it not for the fact that the talented young engineer had prospered well in this world's goods. The news that Mr. Hammond never was in any danger or distress from the day of his arrest, received through official quarters, and further, that at all times during his confinement he was the recipient of many courtesies from the Boer leaders, places some people in a rather embarrassing position. It will be hoped now that the untravelled set so ready at all times to misjudge matters beyond their little horizon, unarrowed down in many cases to the dividing line between this State and Nevada, will tone down their hysteria, upon behalf of people in whom it is impossible to conceive they take the slightest interest, beyond notoriety, or at least confine it within bounds, where it will not become nauseating. Mr. Hammond's present connections are quite capable of seeing him safely through any difficulty, without outside assistance.

A Combination Which Failed.

The Del Monte Convention of Insurance Managers of the Pacific Coast did not succeed in attaining the ends for which it was called. Success was barred by the decisive stand taken, on some contested points, by such prominent men in the business as Messrs. Mullins of the Commercial Union, Magill of the Phoenix and Home, and Belden of the Hartford. The first-named gentleman objected to the plurality vote proviso, while the others cannot agree upon the subject of "non-intercourse." Upon their return to this city there was another attempt made to win the protestants over, but without avail, and again the week passes with the compact unsigned, and the companies still at a "go-as-you-please" gait. There may, however, be some means found before long to settle the difference now existing, and then affairs will, possibly, run smoothly for some time at least.

The Holmes Election.

The annual meeting of the Holmes Mining Company, of Nevada, was held here during the week, with a very full representation of stock. The old Board of Directors was re-elected, with the exception of E. P. Murphy, who retired on account of other business, which necessitated his retirement from the State. Colonel Wm. J. Sutherland continues to act as President, E. S. Spring, Vice President, and C. E. Elliott Secretary. The new concentrating works of the company at Belleville are now nearly completed, and it is expected that large profits will soon result from the reduction of valuable tailings, which exist in large quantities.

A Butte Mine In Bonanza.

The Mining Journal (London), in referring to the progress of work at the celebrated old Bauner mine, near Oroville, on the Feather River, and now known as the Golden Gate of California, quotes the following cablegram just received from the company's secretary, who is now at the mine: "Colonel J. B. Low advises crosscut to the west to be pushed forward as much as possible. Says all the indications are very favorable for fine body of ore in that direction. Bringing report." Colonel Low, well known in local mining circles, and for that matter all over the Western States, is, it might be added, consulting engineer for the London company.

Rich Strikes In Tuolumne.

The manner in which the gold mines in the vicinity of Sonora, in Tuolumne, are developing is simply phenomenal. The App mine, on the 400-foot level, is opening up even richer than its neighbor, the Rawhide, which itself is looking better every day, as depth is attained. Beyond the App, the Jumper has cut the ledge as rich as ever on the 200-level, and experts say it will hold its own with anything in the neighborhood. Some of the ore just cut on the 400-level of the App has been on exhibition in this city during the week, and attracted much attention owing to the rich display of crystallized gold.

A SACRAMENTO buffer who interposes his intellectual adiposity between the dumb brute and the cruel man, would not permit an aeronaut to send a dog down from what the ballooning reporters term "a dizzy height," because the dog might get hurt. Oh, ponder, ye thoughtful ones, on the inconsistency of men. Think, ye lingerers in the highway, of how cheerfully this urbane and merciful beast on two legs, and a chin whisker, will gaze aloft at the poor aerial gymnast, with a secret hope that his gyrating brother may break his neck, so the dull pulses of the spectator may be quickened. But when a snappy, snarling, yelping dog comes in question, forsooth, the perils that beset his caninship must be averted. Faugh, there was more decency in the amphitheatre of old Rome. Give us blood—man's blood—again, and keep the dogs for the sausage machine. Hang the cats over the clothes line, and let them enjoy themselves in an ecstasy of clawing. Let spanking flourish, but turn aside the murderous thumb nail from the ravaging flea.

ALEXANDER Gunn, the sage of Zoar, after two years' wandering in Egypt, has pitched his tent once more among the undulating hills of the city. Mr. Gunn has hobnobbed with the Khedive, and inspected the very innermost apartments of the Sultan's seraglio. When on board Emperor William's yacht, the Unspeakable Turk sent a tray full of orders of the Midjiti to be distributed among the distinguished guests. Only the coal passers accepted them, while the Emperor, in a fit of humorous frenzy, applied the imperial toe to the bottom of the tray, and sent the orders whirling into the Bosphorus. When this was reported to the Sultan by the sorely aggrieved Ottoman who had borne the tray, the monarch wept bitterly, and declared that if Consul George Hall or Northrope Cowles had been on hand, the thing could never have occurred. This is a serious blow to Turkish nobility on this coast.

THE politician is nothing if not a kicker. He knows only one thing, and that is office. And he kicks generally till he gets it—or something else. This time it is Pat Reddy's brother who wants to kick Phil Weaver out of the position of Superintendent of the Almshouse. Because Weaver is not the best man that ever held the place? No, for he is. But because Reddy wants it. A chap who is nothing but an office-seeker is mighty near the Almshouse. If luck don't come his way, he is likely to land there. And for fear he'll have to be a pensioner, he wants to collect the salary of the Superintendent. This time the Fates are apparently wise, and with the help of heaven and the Mayor, and one of the Board of Health, who together are a majority, it looks as if the Almshouse would continue to be the best mauaged public institution in the county. And Reddy will probably kick and be—out.

A WOMAN who was held up by robbers the other day regretted that she was not given opportunity to use her revolver. It was probably fortunate for her horses that she was taken unawares; for when a woman shoots, the general aim always takes precedent over the particular.

JAKE Rudolph, an all-round scoundrel, desperado, and bar-room politician, is making himself obnoxious again. This city is too civilized nowadays to put up with men of this calibre. The penitentiary is the proper place for them.

THE Italian colony has done itself proud entertaining Prince Louis of Savoy. The reporters have filled their details to the letter, and told us how the young man dresses, what he has had for dinner, and whether he affects the quill or wooden toothpick. Go to, go to, ye wonder-makers! Avaunt! ye apostles of provincialism, and wretches, upon whose unlearned brains rests the aspersions that this is a jay town. Cannot this well bred, pleasant young gentleman rest for a few weeks in this republican city without being limned by newspaper artists, and pen painted by newspaper reporters? There is no health about ye, chroniclers of Jinglefuss, who sell the decorum of this I. O. U. village for a measure of cheap pedal wine.

CLARENCE Murphy, the defaulting bank cashier of Salem, has started, not voluntarily, of course, for the scene of his crimes. He was charged with robbing a bank. Murphy was handicapped by his name. Paddy, or Michael, or Con. Murphy could not do wrong. They are well-balanced. But a Clarence, or Adolphus, or Cecil Murphy have much to stagger under. One might as well call a girl Rafferty, Evangeline. There is a fitness about names which should be observed. Parents and godparents will do well to remember this. Barney Vere de Vere is just as incongruous as Clarence Murphy.

PRINCIPAL Joe O'Connor has been charged with threatening to knock the stuffing out of some of his refractory pupils. Ah, me, how woefully the injunction of the good Solomon is neglected. Perchance those critics of Mr. O'Connor would like to see that veteran teacher standing with his hat in his hand, and saying as the freckle-faced crowd passed by, "Go on, my little angels; how sweetly pretty you are; go on and please yourselves about this matter of lemons." Perish the idea. Hurrah for the birch and the boot! Civilization is beginning to smell bad. It wants stirring up.

THE Prince Luigi of Savoy has done us the honor to come among us in a big mau-of-war, and give us a taste of his royal manners. Whether the Prince is a great man, because he is a Prince, or is a Prince because he is a great man, are questions which may be left to the curious to solve. He has a title, and that satisfies him, and pleases us—or ought to. It is enough, also, to give him the entrée to the best Italian circles here. Even the fishermen called on him to pay their respects.

WILLIAM Berg, the great German traveler, is an enthusiastic admirer of Emperor William, whom he closely resembles. Mr. Berg, nevertheless, is on terms of intimacy with Mr. John Bergez, who was born within a stone's throw of the Column Vendome. A few days ago both these gentlemen were fishing in the Lagoon in Marin County. Mr. Bergez had toiled long and unsuccessfully, and was sorely a-thirst. He had forgotten his flask, a lapse of memory of which the Gallic angler is rarely guilty.

"Berg, give me a drink," shouted Mr. Bergez across the lake. Mr. Berg obligingly strolled round the lake, and approached Mr. Bergez, flask in hand.

"Thanks," said the Frenchman.

"Hold," said the German traveler, retaining the flask in his muscular grasp; "one moment, please—which is the greatest country in Europe?"

Mr. Bergez looked appealingly at the stern Teuton. He saw there was no relenting. He must forswear la belle France or go dry.

"Germany," he gasped.

"Drink to the Emperor," enjoined Mr. Berg, solemnly, and the toast was pledged.

On Tuesday night Mr. Berg was dining with Mr. Bergez. The latter was caressing a dust-covered bottle of superb Burgundy. The traveler gazed at it affectionately, and extended his glass with a gleam of anticipation in his eyes.

"One moment, please," said Mr. Bergez coldly; "which is the greatest country in Europe, Mr. Berg?"

There was a moment's painful pause, during which the Gaul passed the bottle under the traveler's nose.

"France," muttered Mr. Berg, unable to resist the bouquet of the vintage. And so the tri-color was avenged.

San Rafael, Sausalito, and Tiburon are in the depths of alarm. The Sydney Smith contingent sit at one end of the smoking car on the way home, and the Foster crowd at the other. They puff cigars and converse in several dangerous languages. The entire subject involves the consolidation of the two railways in Marin County.

There are three horrible rumors:

A ferry boat will visit Tiburon four times a day on its way to Sausalito.

A ferry-boat will call at Sausalito six times a day, omitting Tiburon on two trips!

The said ferry-boat will slight Sausalito on one of the above mentioned trips.

It is reported that the health of a very well known and historic lady of California is rapidly failing. Hitherto it has been for the most part so robust as to excite the marvel of her friends—seeing that she has reached her four-score mark so valorously. Her fascinating and eccentric daughter, whose charming vagaries have become sleeping legends that are occasionally awakened, will inherit much of the large Napa County property; but there are relations in Baltimore and Georgia who will undoubtedly share in the Alabama mines as well as in the valuable estate in this city and in Oakland. The old Lady has always preferred Europe to America, and during the past thirty-two years most of her time has been spent abroad.

In fact, throughout the late Civil War, her residence was at Berlin, where she was constantly a welcome guest at Court. Of late, her residence has been Paris, chiefly, where she had a quiet set of apartments, with her daughter. The two were continually the guests of the Californian colony, and it was extremely notable that mamma always responded greedily, while she never returned the hospitality. However, the daughter would occasionally make up for it on the quiet. Possessed of a fortune that undoubtedly exceeds three millions, the aged mamma's economies were a subject of jest in the American Colony; but her marvellous wit and irony were full recompense to any host for her entertainment.

Two of our fairest heiresses were discussing Paderewski and the Italian Prince in low tones at the Wednesday matinee.

"If both were to propose to you, Ethel," said Kathryn, "which of the two would you take?"

"As a business proposition," replied Ethel, "Paderewski by all odds. He only eats one soft boiled egg a day, with a light supper of Nurnberg Brau and Delicatessen, so that he would be very cheap to keep, whilst he would bring in about fifteen thousand dollars a week, and Pa would invest it for us in the new bond issue. If I married the Prince he would live on Pa's money, and I would have to exist on Italian salads, macearoni and piccoli pesche. It would not be worth being called Princess for that, would it, dear?"

"Ah, love," said Kathryn, "but you forget that—well, perhaps Paderewski is wedded already."

"To whom?"

"To the piano for eight hours a day."

"So much the better," retorted Ethel. "Then I should be free from ten to six."

A reverend lecturer this week on the poets of England and America, gave double first class honors to Charles Warren Stoddard, and placed him facile princeps at the head of the tripod. He is reported as saying that Mr. Stoddard was a writer of imperishable English, and his writings would be immortal. This is all right, but the lecturer ought to see his spelling! Any committee of printers convoked to decide the punishment due to copy in which nine words out of ten are grievous infractions of orthographic rules, would unanimously agree that he ought to be lynched. A dim remembrance of some of his correspondence in Hawaii floats o'er the memory of the LOOKER-ON. A sentence like the following would show Charley at his best: "The silvan woulds farley coruskated with due dropps, shimmering in the wrays of the dieing son, whilst the vesper him of the burds floted softly down the dails, and the purfume of the flours lent gloary to the seen." However, Charles Warren always sends a private note to the editor, begging him to go through his copy before it is cut up into "takes" for the boys.

The distinguished scion of a vast manufacturing house in Great Britain is at present visiting San Francisco. He is Mr. E. Russell of the great steamship builders of Newcastle-on-Tyne. His presence here has been—by his own preference incognito—but it is well-known that it concerns two large steamships which will shortly arrive here consigned to a syndicate. Mr. Russell would be a great catch for some charming American girl for he is debonair, and in looks and manner very much resembles the Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain. He will leave for Japan, in about a week, where he has extensive contracts to fulfill for the Government. Before his return home, Mr. Russell will have "girdled" the globe. Besides his town residence in Glasgow, he has several delightful country-seats—the most beautiful in Ayrshire. During his stay he has been the guest of many of our most prominent Club men.

The statement in some of the Eastern papers that Mrs. Hearst intended building or leasing a house in New York certainly must be an error, and it is firmly contradicted by her friends here. The story probably arose from the fact of her son's recent ownership of the New York Journal, and of his own residence in the East. Mrs.

Hearst is perfectly contented with her beautiful Washington mansion, as with society there.

Somehow or other, Californians have never been happy in New York society, so far as the women folk are concerned. The men get on well in the Clubs, but Mrs. Oelrichs and Miss Fair are really the only actual successes. Mrs. Alexander comes next—but she is rather a succes de Paris,—as the French would say. Dozens of instances might be mentioned where entrance to the mysterious arena of New York's "Four Hundred" was vainly attempted. Even the late Ward McAllister made strenuous endeavors to introduce one of our wealthiest families, but to no avail. As for the men, James and Harry and young Foxhall Keene, Eugene Dewey, Joseph Clark, John Mackay, Jack Follansbee, Eugene Lent and others are exceedingly popular in all the very best clubs, and are welcome guests at the nicest houses. But, still, as a rule, they are more apt to be found at the club than in the drawing-room.

There is one deep regret in the Italian Colony over the visit of Prince Louis of Savoy—he cannot bestow decorations of honor upon his entertainers. The last time we had an illustrious guest from the race of Victor Emmanuel was when the Duke of Genoa came here years ago on the frigate Garibaldi. The Duke was the brother of the present King Humbert, and he was a guest of honor on the vessel, and not an officer, save as Royalty bestows the title of Lord High Admiral upon its sons. The Duke was received with great distinction, and was dined and wined magnificently. It was on one occasion, at this time, that M. H. de Young had an amusing adventure which he always relates with zest. He was among the invited guests of the American contingent at a grand breakfast given by the Italian Colony. A. D. Spivalo was in chief charge of the ceremonies, grand halls, etc., and, after this especial affair, it was arranged that the Ducal party should be driven to the Cliff House and Presidio. Mr. de Young and Mr. Spivalo were to ride in the same barouche with His Royal Highness. Just before leaving the breakfast, a careless waiter spilt a dish of ice-cream over Mr. de Young's elaborate light, bran new trousers. There was a funny scene. But the editor grinned and bore it. However, as they went by the old Chronicle office, the Ducal equipage waited while Mr. de Young climbed the steep stairs and accomplished a rapid transformation. Mr. Mr. Spivalo received from the Duke a splendid decoration of knighthood, which he wears with pride at the present moment. It is a beautiful and costly affair, studded with diamonds, rubies, etc.

One of the most interesting events that have occurred among our many lovers of the turf, will happen next Monday night at the Alcazar Theatre. Mr. David W. Higgins, so well-known by all the Eastern owners of big stables—also by all newspaper men in the entire country—will appear for the first time on the stage and tell what he doesn't know about racing. Mr. Higgins is more famous throughout the country from his racing articles over the nom-de-plume of "Rateplan." The affair will be under the auspices of Mr. Leonard Grover. Mr. Higgins is as dry and sudden in his humor as Bill Nye, and wit will rule the laughter at the Alcazar Monday.

The Insurance Underwriters' banquet at the Palace, on the 18th inst., will mark an era of renewed good fellowship, so they all seem to think. An especial programme has been outlined by President Driffield, and the papers are all to be "just as funny as they can."

The spacious billiard room of the Palace Hotel has been turned into an annex to the famous Grill Room. Guests can now sit at little tables and chat, and need not order anything unless they so desire. The billiard room is now in the basement, handsomely fitted up, and can be reached through the bar by way of a magnificent staircase, with walls of Tennessee marble.

The next thing to a trip to Japan is a visit to George T. Marsh & Co. at 625 Market street. Their Japanese wares are sought by travellers from all over the world.

After dinner try Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum. You will find it admirable.

Helical Tube Premiers

Have Arrived.

1896 Models, $100.

A bicycle frame constructed of Helical tube is more than three times as strong and yet is lighter and more rigid than any other bicycle frame made. For proof of this see U. S. Government test published in our catalogues.

Premiers have been manufactured since 1877. Over a quarter of a million have been made. Most of them are still in use. They are better than ever to-day. Premiers are exclusively made of material that the U. S. Government says is three times as strong as any other. They have a record which confirms this. They sell easier and wear better than any other wheel on earth.

Only a few 1895 models; price, $85.

1895 models in good condition, used but a short time, price $50 to $70.

"KAIRON GNOTHI."

The Secret in Making Money is in this Old Greek Proverb.—
It Means "Know Your Opportunity."—Some of the Men
Who Made Millions by Knowing How.—Very Valuable Information.

WHEN Commodore Vanderbilt was asked how he made his great fortune of $90,000,000, he replied: "It was an easy matter to become rich; just watch for the opportunity, and then take advantage of it," said he. "I commenced with only a few hundred dollars." But there are many people who cannot recognize the opportunity to make money. They may have a little sum to invest but are not in a position to know what is going on.

It is a well-known fact that Commodore Vanderbilt made most of his fortune by buying stocks at a low price, and holding on until they had an immense rise. He had the peculiar gift of knowing just when to buy and when to sell. Other men have made great fortunes in stocks of one kind or another, among them being John W. Mackay, the Rockefellers, and Jay Gould. They all started with small sums.

Among the stocks that have been sensational in their development is the Bell Telephone stock, rising from a very low price to over 200. This stock has paid large dividends and made the original investors rich.

Ten Millions a Year.

The Western Union Telegraph Company started business with $500,000 of capital stock. Its present capital stock is $100,000,000, and pay $5,000,000 a year net profits to the stockholders.

There are many other high-priced stocks that cost original buyers a very low price, and now pay large dividends on many millions of capital stock.

The Edison Electric is another notable example of wonderful development and profit. A broker who bought twenty shares of the original stock at 45, costing $900, sold half of it a year later, getting $30,000 for 10 shares.

The Pullman Palace Car Company's gross earnings have grown until they are over $10,000,000 a year and the stock has gone up from a low price to 180.

There are many chances for making investments, but there are none like the Railway and Dock Construction stock and many prominent men in banking, railroad and financial circles say this stock, which can be bought now at $10 per share, is sure to sell at 50 before long, and eventually have an immense rise like the Bell Telephone, the Edison Electric and Pullman Palace Car stocks.

The par value is $100 per share and the stock is full paid and non-assessable. The stockholders have no individual liability whatever.

Mr. Edward A. Willson, the well-known Vanderbilt stockbroker, says: "In our twenty years experience we have never handled a stock of such intrinsic merit or one which will pay such big profits. This stock gives the small investor an equal chance with the capitalist, as the small investor generally has to buy at par and be content with a dividend of 6 or 7 per cent. a year. Any one can invest in Railway and Dock Construction stock now at $10 per share (the par value is $100) and they can buy from one share upwards at the same price a capitalist buys a thousand shares. The stock is certain to have an immense rise when investors and speculators become aware of its great value as the earnings will pay four and a half per cent. on the par value of the shares, which equals 45 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at the low price of $10 per share.

Surely this is an opportunity which is met with but once in a life-time.

There will be lively times in this stock when it is listed on the Stock Exchange. We deal in numerous bonds that pay from 4 to 5 per cent. a year. We are so confident of the profits that will accompany investment in this stock that we have not the slightest hesitation advising our clients to sell their bonds and invest in Railway and Dock stock while they can buy it at 10. The company is in solid financial condition, has no indebtedness of any kind, and there are no bonds or mortgages ahead of the stock.

The company owns all the rights, titles, interests in, and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell indestructible piles under U. S. patents. The best engineering talent of the world has heretofore been unable to produce a pile that is absolutely indestructible. Many costly experiments have been tried to make wooden piles impervious against decay and the ravages of marine worms, but the wooden piles only last from six months to a few years, requiring continual replacement at great expense.

Certainty of Profit.

There is an enormous demand for indestructible piles in the construction of piers, jetties, docks, bulkheads, breakwaters, foundations for bridge piers, etc.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are, perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. 3000 miles are now being graded or are under contract; the great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s patent pile in solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Many negotiations now pending will create an immense demand for the stock and cause it to sell at a very high figure.

Prominent bankers say: "The public ought to buy this stock now before the price goes up, for, by securing some of the stock now at 10, they can share in the great profits of development and will more than quadruple their capital very soon as the above are only a few of the many sources of earnings that will cause Railway and Dock Construction stock to rise to a high price.

The very moderate estimate of earnings pays 45 per cent. dividend on stock costing only $10 per share without counting in any profits on contracts with the U. S. Government or New York City. When any of these contracts are closed the stock will sell above $100 a share very quickly.

There will be spent by the City of New York in reconstructing a small part of the city water front about $3,000,000 per year for many years to come. In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, Ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

Old Style—New Style.

In place of the old wooden docks covered by temporary sheds which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

New York City's revenue will be greatly enlarged by this vast increase of taxable property on these new piers.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance to the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $1,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston; they are simply loose rock dumped in the water, forming a pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet at the top above the water. Each jetty is about 4½ miles long. The Railway and Dock Construction Co. build indestructible jetties of same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

In addition to all these immense profits the plans of the R. & D. C. Co. call for an expenditure of about $10,000,000 to deepen the channel at Sandy Hook. The U. S. Government can well afford to spend this sum to benefit the vast commercial interests of the port of New York.

Even Bear Speculators Buy.

Not only the bulls but even the very best judges of values, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, are buying this particular stock now—they are aware of its solid intrinsic merit and magnificent future and confidently predict that this one deal alone will put R. & D. C. stock up to $250 a share—and other large contracts will follow.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction must come into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

Powerful influences that will push this project in Congress will cause an active, booming speculation in the stock, an influential lobby and important railway, banking and political interests are in line for this purpose.

Investors can buy the stock at $10 per share, in lots to suit, from the financial agents of the Company, Messrs. Geo. W. Dunn & Co., Bankers, 2 Wall Street, New York. Non-residents can remit to them for the shares by check, draft, money order, registered letter, or by express, or have the stock certificate sent by express C. O. D.

The price will be advanced shortly.

The officials and large stockholders are well-known practical financiers and business men, whose names are at once a synonym for trustworthy, capable management and a guarantee that any stock in which they invest is safe, solid and very profitable. Among them are George W. Dunn, Esq., President of the company, head of the banking house of Geo. W. Dunn & Co., New York, and president, director and trustee of other corporations; he has been prominent in Wall Street for 25 years as a careful, level-headed financier; Hon. Thomas Murphy, ex-Senator, the famous Collector of the port of New York under President U. S. Grant; the eminent lawyer R. A. B. Dayton, Esq., Counsel of the company, 322 Broadway, New York; Eugene Harvey Esq., banker, Drexel Building, Philadelphia, Pa.; R. M. Stanbrough, Esq., capitalist, West Hurley, N. Y.; Geo. D. Hilyard, Esq., contractor, New York; W. A. Childs, Esq., of the Calumet and Hecla Copper Co., Calumet, Mich.; Edward A. Willson, Esq., broker, New York; Geo. B. Shellhorn, Esq., Receiver Montgomery, Tuscaloosa and Memphis Railway Co., Montgomery, Ala.; Y. Carryer, Esq., of the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company, Field, B. C., Canada; Howard Swineford, Esq., of Howard Swineford & Co., Richmond, Va.; W. M. Shipp, Esq., cashier of Deposit Bank, Midway, Ky.; Jacob Deyo, cashier Huguenot Bank, New Paltz, N. Y.; C. E. Harwood, Esq., cashier Rockville National Bank, Rockville, Conn., and other prominent gentlemen.

The Railway and Dock Construction Company has an absolute monopoly and its earnings will increase with the steady growth of commerce and of railroads.

The secret of making money is in the old Greek proverb "KAIRON GNOSHI" (KNOW YOUR OPPORTUNITY).—The New York Mercury.

A Change of Significance. It is a singular fact that what is often discussed under the name of platonic love was not referred to by the great Greek philosopher in his famous disquisition on the subject of love. The error embodied in the term is too old and well established to be cured at this late date, and platonic love will continue to mean something entirely different from what Plato had in mind. It may, however, be worth while to point out that a certain intimate personal relation between man and mau existed, and was generally approved of, in the civilization of ancient Greece, though to modern eyes and in the light of Christianity it appears unnatural, depraved and abhorrent. On the other hand, what is commonly known in these days as platonic love is a pure friendliness or passionless personal intimacy between man and woman; a kind of affection wholly uninfluenced by sexuality. In this sense the relation is rather an ideal, a mental abstraction, than a thing known to experience, particularly where the persons in question have any degree of physical attractiveness. In one of the most witty papers of the original Spectator, Addison has some highly interesting reflections on the subject of platonic, and warns his fair readers against their influence in the month of May.

"THE two P's are all the rage just now," said a pretty girl at a recent luncheon: "Paderewski and the Prince." The women, as might have been expected, have prostrated themselves at the feet of the maestro, but the Prince has not done likewise at the shrine of any of our beauties. Some one has suggested his being asked to decide which one of our belles, married or single, is entitled to the honor of helleship. What a position to place him in!

The marriage of E. W. Holladay to Miss Huntington in New York recalls the groom's lofty lineage. So far as beauty is concerned he has always been considered the Narcissus of the San Francisco Bar. But added to his charms is that which will prove in the future a great inheritance. He is the only son, and his two sisters are well provided for. The elder married an English official high in the British Diplomatic Corps, while Ruth, the younger, has made two brilliant English alliances, first with young Blacknell, and afterwards with Captain Brooke, of Her Majesty's Guards. She is one of the most popular women in London society—and has grown prettier every year of her life. The groom's father, Hon. S. W. Holladay, is a pioneer, and his wife is the sister of General Ord of illustrious war memories. He was one of our first Commanders at the Presidio in early days and was the same one who gave Lieutenant Scott such a fright by telling him there was no monkey on the porch,—when the young officer was infused with liquid enthusiasm. General Ord and his brother were from Baltimore, Maryland, and were the sons of George IV, King of England by his Morganatic wife, Mrs. Jordan. There have been many questions raised concerning this, but, it has been so well proved in London that no further doubt appears to exist according to the Genealogical magazines.

Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Holladay will not be present at the New York wedding of their son to Miss Huntington. The journey is too arduous at this chilly season of the year. At first it was the intention of the young couple to visit Florida, but later their plans were changed, and their visits will be paid to Boston, Hartford, Baltimore, New Haven and other Eastern cities. The postponement of the marriage until the 25th inst. was, it seems, owing to the delay in completing the new Huntington mansion, where the ceremony will be performed. Captain and Mrs. Brooke are now on a visit to Georgetown, Demerara, to the Hon. and Mrs. Messer (nee Miss Lou Holladay). It is interesting to learn that the latter's household is graced by two beautiful children. There will be a complete family reunion in London next summer, but in the interval the young bride and bridegroom will visit California.

On dit Biblical parables are to be one of the programmes for the approaching Lenten festivities of the "swagger set." How admirably they could illustrate the ancient wise virgins who trimmed their lamps before going out; as not alone does the swagger set contain several ancient virgins of great wisdom, but they are well equipped for going out to meet a bridegroom. The silly ones on the outside edge of this charmed circle, yclept "swagger," are the girls who expect to find one without having the wherewithal to light their way.

What utter idiots some of our women are making of themselves over Paderewski. Many girls wear his picture in Trilby hearts, while the old hens who waylay him in the hotel corridors are beyond counting. An up-to-date young matron bet her friends she would speak to the maestro, and, accordingly, knocked at his door, but, to her disgust, the knock was not responded to, and, when she tried the door, it was locked on the inside, although the sound of a piano from within showed the genius of music to be there.

The orthodox church people are somewhat scandalized over the intention of a fashionable set to hold fortnightly entertainments during Lent, and of all nights to choose, Fridays! They are wondering if Good Friday will be selected for the Noh Hill residence and the Passion Play the diversion (?) of the occasion. Much comment is being made on the subject.

It seems there has been a curious crowd around the Crocker residence lately, which no one could make out until it was rumored that the people were full of the idea that not alone the Italian Prince, but the Prince of pianists, Paderewski, was visiting Prince Poniatowski!

A WOMAN'S CONFESSION.—FROM SONNETS AND LYRICS BY AURORA TRIST.

YES, kiss me, beloved;
I yield to your lips;
But my spirit slips
Away from your touch,
If you kiss overmuch.
Yes, hold me, beloved!
I feel your control;
But my wayward soul
Takes wings fleet and strong
If you hold me too long.
Ah! kiss me, beloved!
But find a new way,
A more subtle play
To arouse and awake
Me to want what you take.
Ah, hold me, beloved!
But most by a spell,
That I may not tell
Why I stay, nor yet know
How I ever could go.

A MINOR CHORD.—ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE, IN BROOKLYN EAGLE.

Here is a song of another's singing
The throbbing grief of a nameless pain;
Close to my heart are its measures ringing
And tears well up like a drift of rain.
Hope is dead and has left no token;
We cried a little, we loved it so;
"We whose hearts have been broken, broken,
Broken ever so long ago."
The skies are sad and the fields are sodden,
The woods are reeking with rotten things;
I walk in silence in ways untrodden,
Far from the crowd and the tannt that stings.
What does it matter when fate has spoken?
What can we say that the world should know?
"We, whose hearts have been broken, broken,
Broken ever so long ago."

LOVE AND LOVE.—MARION E. TEALL.

And though I sit alone, and no one says "I love you," now;
Sometimes there comes a glance, a tone, down through the weary years
That cheers my lonely heart, despite its fears,
And times its beating to the precious thought,
I have been loved.
I will be loved.
For there is love and love; and if I strive to win a part
Of this most precious thing, without which life is bleak and bare,
By self-forgetfulness; by light'ning others' care,
Then I can write, not I have been, nor I will be,
But I am loved.

SPRING VIOLETS.—GRACE HIBBARO, IN SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN.

"Wear them, and think of me to-day," I said
And fastened violets upon her dress,
Their perfume floated upward to her face,
Like some fair spirit's loving, fond caress.
They stayed with her through all that spring-tide day,
Those wild-wood blossoms—why were they so blest?
And when the stars shone in the evening skies,
Their life work done, they died upon her breast.

RENUNCIATION.—FLORA M'DONALD SHEARER.

For me, I never knew the way
To gain the crowns of life—
A chance spectator of the fray,
A watcher of the strife.
And so, it is not hard for one
With naught to lose or win
To mark the setting of the sun,
And see the night begin.

The name is but the guinea stamp;
The joke 's the gowd for n' tbat.

Mrs. Point Breeze—I'm deeply concerned about my niece Ethel. I don't know how she is to get along. She has no money to live on, and she can't earn her own living, for she is nearly deaf, and I am afraid she will lose her eyesight. Mr. POINT BREEZE—Oh, don't worry. She'll make an excellent chaperon.

"What brought you to this place, my friend?" inquired a visitor at the penitentiary of a convict. "A mere matter of opinion got me here, sir." "Impossible!" "No, sir. I expressed the opinion that I was innocent, and the jury expressed the opinion that I wasn't. It's a cold world, sir."

"Do you have any luck in your literary work, Wilkins?" "Yes. I didn't use to think so, but I do now." "What has caused you to change your mind?" "I've been reading over my rejected stuff, and I'm perfectly delighted to think it didn't get printed over my name."

"I'd like to hear you play the violin, Mr. Tillinghast," said seven year old Tommy Dillingham, who was entertaining the caller. "But I don't play the violin, Tommy." "Then papa must be mistaken. I heard him tell mamma that you played second fiddle at home."

Jinks—I am always embarrassed when I want to say the word v-a-s-e. I don't know whether to say vaze, vace, vahz, or vawse. BLINKS—You might take a hint from our hired girl. She simply speaks of all ornaments as "them there."

"That's a handsome suit you have on," remarked Tomkins, admiring the new winter suit of his hard-up friend. "Yes, it is a right nobby suit." "How much did it cost?" "I don't know. I've not been sued for it yet."

"Matrimony," said the sage, "is merely a matter of one letter. Before he gets her he yearns for her, and after he earns for her. That is all. The class may now go home and split the wood for its suppers."

"Beauty is only skin deep," said the zebra, with an attempt to liven up the gloom of the menagerie. "I know," replied the rhinoceros, trying to be cheerful, "but think what that means in my case."

BRIGGS—I hear that Piltzer and his wife are not living with her parents now. GRIGGS—Is that so? What is the reason? BRIGGS—He won enough from the old man at poker to move out.

"Have you heard that the big sleeves are going out, George, dear?" "Yes, my love, I have; but I don't believe it." "Why, pray?" "I don't believe they can get through the door."

Good Samaritan—Don't you know better than to drive that poor horse up hill so fast? O'CONNOR—Up hill, is it? Oh, hegorra, the nag's blind, and he can't see it.

Mr. Cheviot Hill—Why did you break the engagement if you were in love with me all the time? MISS DOLLY BRONSON—To make you propose all over again, dear.

English and American Wine Drinkers.

According to Ridley's Wine and Trade Circular, the ruling quotations for familiar brands of champagne in the London market are: Pommery Sec. 83 to 88 shillings.

Moet, 75 shillings.

Perrier, 72 shillings.

Mumm, 70 to 75½ shillings.

While the consumer here pays about the same price for all brands of reputable champagnes, and thereby creates the impression that one wine is about the same as another to him as long as it is a reputable champagne, the English wine-drinker is always willing to pay the highest price for what he considers the best wine, and though we have in our country as good connoisseurs as there are in England, yet the average American will rarely take the time and the trouble to try the relative merits of the different brands, and too often leaves to the knight of the bar or the garcon the choice of the brand.—New York Recorder.

HOW TO PREVENT SEASICKNESS.—Much has been said and written about seasickness and the possibilities of preventing or at least ameliorating it. The remedies have hitherto, however, mostly proved inefficacious, and the landsman is either advised not to go to sea, or else to bear the temporary inconvenience as best he may. It is now claimed—and there will be many to welcome the news—that as nausea emanates from a disturbed condition of the brain, brought about through the upsetting of the nervous system, an extended treatment of bromides, inducing bromization, will effectually put a stop to the cause and ensure the traveler the same comfort on the high seas that he gets when on shore. This condition must be brought about several days before sailing and must be kept up during the first few days of the voyage, or longer, if necessary. Taking into consideration the effects of the drug when taken in excess, it is probably better for the average person to let it alone and let nature take its course, and to bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of.

Moreover, seasickness, although decidedly unpleasant, is not fatal, but in many cases beneficial.

DEAD FRENCH WARRIORS.—A cminent Frenchman with a taste for statistics has been calculating the number of his countrymen who have fallen in warfare during the past hundred years, and he brings the "butcher's bill" of the French nation up to the enormous total of six millions. This figure covers the losses in the wars of 1791 to 1800 and the following terrible fifteen years, all of which may be credited to Napoleon's unbounded ambition. Of the 3,157,598 men enrolled from 1800 to the time of Waterloo, and the following terrible fifteen years, all of which may be credited to Napoleon's unbounded ambition. Of the 3,157,598 men enrolled from 1800 to the time of Waterloo, and the following terrible fifteen years, all of which may be credited to Napoleon's unbounded ambition. SMOKELESS POWDER.—Dr. R. J. Gatling, the inventor and manufacturer of the Gatling gun, claims that all the guns in the world which use black powder are obsolete; smokeless powder, in his opinion, will supersede all other powders, and therefore all cannon, guns and rifles which have been using the old-fashioned black powder are practically useless, and the nations of the world will have to renew their armament at the cost of millions of dollars. The inventor is seventy-five years of age, but is still hale and hearty.

A NEW WAY TO MAKE MONEY.—Stamp dealers offer $75 for one million canceled stamps, which can be conveniently packed in an ordinary sugar barrel. A Boston lady has collected two millions, but has not sold them yet. Another lady had one million and sold them for $125. The reason why she received this figure is because there were several among them of great value. It took her exactly two years to accumulate them.

A REMEDY FOR BALDNESS.—Every one with a bald head will be interested in this. Brush the scalp twice a day with a stiff brush; then apply this preparation with a soft cloth: Carbolic acid, 30 drops; tincture of nux vomica, two drams; tincture of red cinchona bark, one ounce; tincture of cantharides, 25 drops; coconut oil, one ounce, and alcohol enough to make four ounces.

CURE FOR ERYSIPELAS.—A report just issued by the chief of the Parisian Hospital of Contagious Diseases, states that the microbes of erysipelas, long since known to the medical fraternity, is now made impotent by a serum built up through horses and pigs. It is expected that cancer can also be subdued by the same treatment.

AN International Exposition is to be held in Montreal from May 24th until October 12th of this year. It will be the first extensive Exposition Canada has ever had and great preparations are being made to ensure success in its every detail.

THE originator of the loving cup was King Henry of Navarre, who, while hunting, became separated from his companions, and, feeling thirsty, called at a wayside inn for a cup of wine. The maid who offered it to him as he sat on horseback forgot to present the handle. The wine was spilt and His Majesty's garments were soiled. While riding home he bethought him that a two-handed cup would prevent a recurrence of this, so His Majesty had a two-handed cup made at the royal pottery and sent it to the inn. On his next visit he called again for wine, when to his astonishment, the maid (having received instructions from her mistress to be very careful of the king's cup) presented it to him holding it herself by each of its handles. At once the happy idea struck the king of a cup with three handles, which was promptly acted upon, as His Majesty quaintly remarked, "Surely out of three handles I shall be able to get one!" Hence the loving cup.

—Queen Anne of England was the first woman to attempt to do anything for her sex. She was in favor of self-supporting women, and tried in many ways to change the conditions of the day. The profession of literature, especially, she held, should be followed by women. She was attacked for this by all the satirists of the day, Swift in particular. "The Ladies' Diary, or Woman's Almanac," as it was called, a journal devoted to the interests of women, was started in her reign, and was extensively patronized by women.

—The colors used by various nations to express grief differ greatly. In Europe and America black is used because, being the privation of light it means to us the end of life. In China white is used, that being the symbol of purity. The old Romans also used the same color. In Ethiopia the inhabitants take brown, that being the color of Mother Earth "to which each man returns." In Egypt the people have the most picturesque idea of all. The mourners dress in yellow, that being the color of the leaves when they fall and the flowers when they fade.

—The Pope is a well-guarded individual in his home life. Only his private valet and his secretary have access to his bed chamber. It is a small room with a simple bed in an alcove adorned with graceful marble columns, a writing table, an arm chair, and one wardrobe. In his study is one large, uncomfortably straight-backed arm chair, a magnificent thing to look at, but hard to sit at ease in. Then there is another small room with only an old lounge and an old easy chair in it. This is where His Holiness retires to take an afternoon nap.

—A rumor comes from London that Sir Henry Irving is about to forsake the old Lyceum on Wellington street and go into Daly's Theatre in the West End. The move will doubtless be a good one, although when Irving is concerned the public will willingly tramp over half London to see him. What one chiefly regrets is that an old landmark of the world's metropolis will slowly pass into oblivion with its many memories—dear not only to the hearts of Londoners, but to citizens of the world at large.

—A French writer says: "Constant new clothes greatly encourage morality in women. Therefore, those men who admire this quality in their womankind will do well to provide them with much money wherewith to buy gowns and bonnets, and thereby keep their minds employed in a pleasing and harmless manner."

—Sarah Bernhardt cannot very well feel at home in New York this trip. Usually she takes dogs, cats, parrots, and all sorts of pets with her. This time she is accompanied only by a collie. Perhaps her bicycle more than makes up for the loss of the others.

—The German Emperor heralded in his birthday by calling out several regiments of soldiers from their beds in answer to false alarms. It can hardly be expected of the men that they wish him many happy returns of the day.

—It is said that in Madison County, Kentucky, people who have paid their taxes are entitled to be married by the Sheriff without cost.

A Book of the Week. Professor Blackie was a singular mixture of the grave and the gay, the serious and the frivolous, the ignorant and the learned. He was, indeed, so singular that none of the great men of his day took him seriously. He was well-known to many of the leading men of his time—Lord John Russell, Sir Stafford Northcote, Laurance Oliphant, Lord Idlesleigh, Professor Freeman, Carlyle, and others; and yet, so far as we remember, not one of them did him the little courtesy to remember him in any of their writings. He was, too, very provincial, and he carried the hay seeds into the class room, and betrayed his lack of refinement on the lecture platform and on the streets. He was Bohemian in his dress, uncouth in his manners, and his open disregard of the forms and rules of ordinary life, and, at times, his buffoonery, caused his hosts of well-wishers to blush for shame at his childishness and grotesque behavior. That he was popular, in spite of all this provincialism, all the world of letters knows, and it did not require this book to assure us how much beloved he was, even in face of the ridicule he caused by his whistling in the public thoroughfares, by singing comic songs in the middle of a serious lecture, or by playing the mountebank in general—a part this odd, learned, beloved, laughed-at, and ignorant Professor could perform so well. No man in modern times ever had such a hold on the sympathies of the Scottish people as Professor Blackie, for his simplicity, his naturalness, his kindliness, and his enthusiasm more than counterbalanced his oddities and his want of knowledge about things which every school boy is supposed to know. He knew Greek and Latin as well as the Professor of classics in a great university should, and he had a working knowledge of German, Italian, and French; but when, in his old age, he went through Westminster Abbey, he showed a lamentable ignorance of the early English Kings, and be, at all times, exposed himself to ridicule when he ventured to talk about politics or “the dismal science” of political economy. The writer of this biography does not, we are glad to see, err on the side of too much praise, for she is frank enough to tell us many of the Professor’s characteristics. Indeed, the details of his contest for the Professorship of Greek are as amusing as the description of an old-time Irish election. For instance, he sent his testimonials to the “Bailies” without paying the postage, and his conduct during the election was so outrageous that his friends had to beg him not to come up to Edinburgh till the contest was over, and it was, no doubt, owing to this fact that his election was won by the casting vote of the Provost, and from that day the life of Professor Blackie was one of boisterous energy. It is somewhat difficult to reconcile the boyish impishness, the incalculable impulses, the noisy laughter which checkered the University career of Professor Blackie, with his gentle, tender, and tranquil conduct in the domestic circle. In private life, we are told that he was as gentle as a lamb, but the intrusion of a stranger transformed him into “an excited, reckless, and startled being.” We must, of course, accept Miss Stoddard’s statement as true, and we are thus willing to make many allowances for a man who can make the domestic hearth the abode of that “only happiness that survived the Fall.” But this does not account for his popularity among those who knew him in the outside world in which he lived. His friends, Miss Stoddard tells us, often remonstrated with him on his habit of boisterous jocularity with his students; but he seems, on the whole, to have been incorrigible. “It was,” she says, “a matter for regret to all who knew his worth, that his palate itched for this dubious popularity, and that the craving grew upon him.” But all this did not prevent his voice from being heard on the platforms of the three Kingdoms, and his eccentricities were on every tongue. In England he was lionized, and those eccentricities of his were accepted as the peculiarities of genius. He failed, indeed, in acquiring the high respect of academic circles, but then for fifty years he secured the love of the people, and the incidents surrounding that love were often pathetic in their tenderness. But while Miss Stoddard has written a good biography of Professor Blackie, she has also given us some sentences which betray a delightful Scotch complacency which we find amusing. In one place, for instance, she says “In England the middle classes can rarely boast of connection with a romantic past, but in Scotland the blue blood of a squandered loyalty, of a faithfulness unto death, whatever the cause, fills the veins of the middle classes. Their ancestors were Jacobites or Covenanters, and so, even unto this generation, men are to be found inheriting their strong individuality, refusing the dull canals of conventional life, and working their way in self-worn channels, through obstacles as unrelenting as their granite rocks.” This is delightful, and the sympathetic reader must admit that it is true, even if it is provincial in its tendency. Then there is something worth remembering in the method of education in those days. Thus it is related of a Divinity Professor at Aberdeen: “One of his students has placed it on record that in four years of lectures he never once heard the name of Jesus Christ; but then he was an Evangelical and clearly expected too much.” Just think of it being “too much” to expect to hear the name of the Savior mentioned by a Divinity Professor! Fancy the Divinity Professor who for four years never mentioned Him at all! We do not know which to be the most surprised at. Take the book all in all, Miss Stoddard has given us two volumes of much interest, and it is all the more valuable because it has the appearance of being critical as well as accurate.

*“The Life of Professor Blackie, of Edinburgh University.” By Miss Anna Stoddard.

“Opera Stories” is a publication that has had many predecessors. The histories of the operas have been told and re-told in every tongue in Europe, and there are few opera goers who do not know the story of Paust, Carmen, Lucia di Lammermoor, Traviata, Don Giovanni, and all the many creations of Verdi, Mozart, Gluck, Rossini, Donizetti, Wagner, and all the other masters of romantic, grand, or opera comique.

The Athenæum says that “Jude the Obscure” is a “technically bad book.” This is quite as severe as our criticism of the work. For wickedness, “Jude the Obscure” is Titanic.

OF course the event of the week, from a society standpoint, was the first appearance of Paderewski at the California, on Monday night, when the Four Hundred crowded the house to greet him. As a consequence, the last dance for this season given by the Monday Evening Club, at Golden Gate Hall, suffered somewhat in point of attendance. Still, it was a very pleasant party, and all the members regret that the reunions are now but memories of the past.

On Tuesday Mrs. Jacob Stern and Mrs. Samuel Heller were the joint hostesses of a very elaborate yellow luncheon at their Leavenworth street residence, given in honor of the recent bride, Mrs. Abe Stern, nee Elsie Mayor, at which nearly forty of their lady friends were entertained in the most delightful manner. Mrs. L. L. Baker also gave a luncheon party on Tuesday, her guests numbering a dozen ladies, and Mrs. Foreman's dinner the same day was a charming affair.

On Tuesday evening the "Native Sons" dedicated the new hall, in their beautiful new building on Mason street, with a ball which was a brilliant success in every sense; while in Oakland the first of Mrs. George Wheaton's "at homes" attracted a number from this side of the bay. Mrs. Remi Chabot gave a tea at her home in Oakland on Wednesday afternoon; on Wednesday evening the members of the Union League Club gave a banquet and dance, at which the guests were limited to the members and their families, and the locale the Maple Rooms of the Palace Hotel. The Fortnightly Club, of Oakland, gave a St. Valentine's Party at Military Hall on Thursday evening. One would almost call this a week of farewells, for last night the Friday Fortnightlies gave their last dance of the season, at Lunt's Hall, with great clat. It was a Leap Year cotillion under the management of Miss Hobart, and the whole affair was carried on, according to Leap Year rules, with much success.

Teas will be in order to-day. One is to be given by Mrs. John M. Cunningham, at her residence on Pacific avenue, and music will be a leading feature; and at the Mercantile Library Building the ladies of that Auxiliary will entertain their friends in a similar manner.

The Misses Williams, who are about to return to their home in Ross Valley after a visit to San Francisco of several months, gave a tea at the Richelieu in conjunction with Miss Edith McBean, on Saturday last, and in that way returned some of the many hospitalities of which these charming young ladies have been the recipients during their stay in town. It was largely attended and a very pleasant affair.

Among recent events are Mrs. H. W. Seale's daffodil luncheon, at the Occidental Hotel, in compliment to Miss Mattie Whittier; Joe Grant's dinner in the red room of the Bohemian Club; Mrs. Henry Scott's Children's Party; Mrs. Ben Morgan's violet luncheon in Berkeley, at which Mrs. Florence Herrich Requa was guest of honor; the Barouess Von Schroeder's, and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis's luncheons.

Ross Valley was the scene of a very pretty out-of-town wedding on Monday last, when, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Butler, Bishop Nichols united in wedlock Miss Grove Crittenden and Carl August Windel. The house was beautifully adorned with ferns, acacia blooms, and the sweet-scented violet in all its varieties; and the altar in the bay window, at which the vows were exchanged, was adorned with smilax and white primroses. The pretty bride, who was costumed in white satin trimmed with lace and natural orange blossoms, was attended by her sister, Miss Laura Crittenden, as maid-of-honor, who wore a dainty gown of white organdie over pink silk; and eight bridesmaids, the Misses Buchanan, Weston, Van Wyck, Smedberg, Lichtenberg, Knapp, Hall, and Toule, all gowned alike in white silk with pink satin ribbon garniture. Dr.

Gustave Gutsch supported the groom as best man. There was a large gathering present of friends from the city and the surrounding country, and an elegant wedding déjeuner was served at the conclusion of the ceremony. Later in the day the happy pair departed for their honeymoon trip down South.

Amid a wealth of floral surroundings and other artistic decorations, Miss Henrietta Sullivan and John Loring Harris were wedded at the home of the bride on Hayes street last Wednesday evening, the Rev. Father O'Shea, of St. Louis, performing the ceremony in the presence of a large assemblage of guests. The bride's attendants were her sister, Miss Georgie Sullivan, as maid-of-honor, the Misses Louise and Ada Sheeby, and her two nieces, Ashley Belle Turner and Gladys Sullivan. Edwin Harris appeared in the role of his brother's best man. The bridal robe was of heavy cream white satin, elaborately trimmed on the waist with point applique lace; a diamond crescent confined the fleecy tulle veil to the bride's coiffure, and she carried a bouquet of roses and lilies of the valley. The gown of the maid-of-honor, Miss Sullivan, was of light blue brocaded silk, trimmed with chiffon and white pearls, and the hand bouquet was of beauty roses and violets; the bridesmaids were costumed alike in pink brocade, and carried bouquets of Lancaster roses. After the ceremony there was dancing until near midnight, when supper was served. Mr. and Mrs. Harris are spending their honeymoon at Coronado.

Wednesday was a popular day this week, for besides those affairs already mentioned, were the second Paderewski concert; Mrs. Tim Hopkins's elaborate rose luncheon, and Mrs. Bigelow's dance. Mrs. Claus Spreckels and Miss Emma received their friends at a "tea," and between the hours of four and six o'clock the residence on Howard street was well filled with guests. The floral display was very handsome, roses and hyacinths predominating, and after the duties of the occasion were ended the ladies who assisted in receiving remained to dine with their hostess, an equal number of gentlemen joining them, so the small tête-à-tête tables at which dinner was served accommodated twenty-four guests.

The constantly increasing number of marriage engagement announcements promise an active post-Lenten season in that respect. Among the most recent are those of Miss Fanny Crocker to Robert McCreary, of Sacramento; Miss Mabel Army to Fred H. Sears; and Miss Mabel Love to Lieutenant Churchill, of the Navy. Though no dates have been named, it is probable they will all be events of the not very distant future.

With the coming of Lent, though a goodly proportion of society will be in a state of reticence from the frivolities of fashionable life, it must not be supposed that all of that select body are going to indulge in sackcloth and ashes. To be sure the gatherings will be smaller and more on the quiet. Cards will be the feature of some, and music of others; but first on the list will stand the resuracted Vaudeville Club, which will hold fortnightly meetings at the houses of the different members. Dr. Harry Tevis is to have chief management of the entertainments, and that he will be a successful master of ceremonies, who can doubt. The first one will be held at Mrs. Will Crocker's, but just what form it will take has not yet become public property.

Mrs. Will Tevis has arrived from her Bakersfield villa, and will pass several weeks at the Palace while engaged in the delightful occupation of "shopping."

Under the auspices of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club, a steeple-chase is to be held on Tuesday next, governed by the rules of the Steeple-chase and Pony Association. The participants will be: R. M. Tobin, Henry Simpkins Hobart, Prince Louis of Savoy, Lieutenant Smedberg, Lieutenant Benson, W. R. Whittier, G. Bagot, G. Wright, and Jas. T. Archibald.

The Saturday Morning Orchestra will give its first benefit concert at Metropolitan Hall next Monday evening, February 17th, under the leadership of Signor Roncovieri, and assisted by the gentlemen of the Philharmonic Society. The young vocalist, Miss Caroline H. Little, will render three delightful numbers, selecting the composers Bishop, Thomas, and Marchesi.

The Mardi Gras Ball of the Art Association next Tuesday night shows every indication of being the most beautiful entertainment ever given in San Francisco. The house itself makes a magnificent setting, but, added to this, John Stanton and a corps of artist assistants have been busy turning it into an Aladdin's palace. The effects of color and lighting will be surprisingly enchanting. Hundreds of incandescent lights have been put throughout the building. This event will be highly creditable to the artistic taste of San Francisco. A number of the lady patronesses met last Wednesday at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art and took the matter of the invitations in hand, and gave many very valuable suggestions which will be followed by the management—for instance, supper will be served continuously after eleven o'clock, and two bands of music, one in the main hall and one in the salon, which connects with five dancing halls, will play alternately, so the air will always be filled with music. Some of the richest stuffs of the Orient have been contributed by generous firms and individuals for decorative purposes, and they will represent tens of thousands of dollars in value. Art and the patrons of art will be represented by two well-known gentlemen. Mr. Amadee Joullin will be Rex, and Mr. Tarn McGrew will personate Prince Carnival. George T. Bromley will be the Court poet, and Captain Robert H. Fletcher, the author of "Marjory" and "Johnstown Sketches," has written the royal proclamation. Rex and the Prince will have a large retinue, for the committeemen are to come in costume, besides a large number of others. The scene will be bright and gay with colors. The Queen and Princess will be bludily selected from among the lady maskers. Under the gallery in the main hall a balcony has been constructed, and from it, after blare of trumpets, the proclamation will be read, and the command will be to forget dull care and join the revels. The grand march will begin at nine o'clock, when all participants are requested to be in line to pass through the rooms, before the assembled spectators, for whom seats have been prepared. There will be an auction of seats this afternoon in the Institute Building, commencing at 12.30.

An entertainment in aid of the Doctors' Daughters will be given at the residence of Mrs. Clark W. Crocker, on Thursday evening, February 20th. It will consist of pictures from Gibson and other artists. The pictures will be represented by young society ladies and men under the direction of Mr. Addison Mizner. Tickets will be sold for $1.50. Light refreshments will be served (these included in the price for tickets). Tickets can be purchased from the members of the Society and the following officers: Mrs. P. B. Horton, President; Mrs. Fred H. Green, Mrs. Edward Belcher, Vice-Presidents, Mrs. John Vail, Recording Secretary; Miss McEwen, Corresponding Secretary; Miss Hyde, Treasurer.

The Misses Morrison, of San Jose, entertained a charming house party from Saturday last till Monday, at their residence, corner Fifth and Julian streets. The guests were: Judge Hawley, Judge Gilbert, Mrs. Sawyer, Judge Houghton, and Miss Hanford, of Seattle. An informal reception was also given in their honor, the guests being: Judge and Mrs. H. G. Bond, Mr. and Mrs. S. F. Lieh, Dr. Grissim, Miss Ryland, Mr. Findlay, Colonel Moorhead, Mr. J. A. Porter, of Denver, Mr. Alvord, Mr. E. De Saissett, Mr. H. E. Morrison. A four-in-hand drive was enjoyed on Sunday, the party returning to the city Monday morning.

The programme of the dedication exercises of the N. S. G. W. Hall Association was interesting in the extreme. Jas. D. Phelan delivered the opening address. The inaugural hall given last Tuesday evening was a success in the highest sense of the word.

A testimonial concert, in which the Reliance Glee Club, Miss Mabel Love, Frank Coffin, and Frank Belcher are to participate, will be tendered Miss Daisy Belle Sharpe at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium on Monday evening next.

On Thursday evening a concert under the auspices of the California Quartette will be given in St. John's Presbyterian Church, corner California and Octavia streets, for the benefit of the church.

Mr. and Mrs. S. F. Lieh have returned from their Eastern trip, accompanied by Miss Grissim. Judge H. G. Bond leaves for an Eastern trip this week.

SAN FRANCISCO NEWS LETTER

California Advertiser.

Vol. LII.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1896.

Number 8.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT, 605-607-613 Merchant street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

WITH a full Treasury confidence will be restored over the entire country.

DR. Dille will visit Honolulu. A word of friendly caution is extended to Mrs. Liliuokalani Dominis.

THE old monitor, Comanche, is to be handed over to the Naval Reserve of California. Verily, our coast defenses are picking up.

THE Pest-house should be located where it will inconvenience no one, and not be an obstacle to the improvement of valuable real estate.

THE theft of State property supplied to the State Board of Silk Culture should be traceable to some one and the offender brought to justice.

IT is better for California to let her railroads remain in the hands of Californians. Outsiders may prove hard masters if we once give them the opportunity to do so.

WHEN Italian anarchists are permitted to preach their revolutionary doctrines in this city, it is time for the police to interfere in the matter. This is a free country, but anarchists, like vermin, are subject to small consideration.

THE recommendation of Secretary Herbert to increase the Navy by two new battleships and twelve torpedo boats is a good one. The number, however, is insufficient. We need a navy as powerful as that of any European power.

THE Chinese Government is raising a loan of one hundred million taels. England and Germany will provide this money, which is intended for the payment of the war indemnity to Japan. It is a pity that the loan cannot be provided for by this country, as the security is all that could be desired.

NOW that the Postoffice Department has issued instructions ordering the arrest of managers and proprietors of newspapers containing obscene articles, pictures, and advertisements when the same are sent through the mails, it is possible that a higher tone will soon become apparent in our great dailies. The home has been desecrated long enough.

THE rumor, started some time ago by Mayor Sutro, that the water supplied by the Spring Valley Water Company is not fit for drinking purposes has been pronounced to be entirely without foundation. The Board of Health recently supplied samples of the fluid to leading chemists for analysis, and they pronounced it free from impurities and healthful in every respect.

BEFORE the Monroe Doctrine affair blows over, it would be a good thing for America and England to come to some definite understanding concerning it and the limitations it puts upon colonization on this side of the Atlantic. Ours is above all things a peaceful era. The people of both countries shun war, and the matter should be clearly settled so as to prevent later and more dangerous disputes.

A DRUGGIST out on Market street makes a point of exhibiting in his store window certain articles devoted exclusively to the use of the female sex. Such goods should be kept inside, and not paraded before the gaze of the public. It is only natural to suppose that women know where to find them when desired, and their exhibition is an offense to decency and food for the pruriently minded.

TROUBLE is apparently smoldering between Germany and France. It is more than likely that the next few years will witness the final conflict between these two nations. Something is necessary to clarify the European political atmosphere and ensure peace during the century to come. Things could not be worse than they are at present, commercially speaking, and some sort of settlement will speedily restore the world's equilibrium.

THE labor unions have organized with the ostensible purpose of going into politics for their own protection. The chief legislation they have to fear is that of their leaders, but a little experience may prove beneficial to them. They are further determined upon prohibiting armed or unarmed private detectives from entering the State to suppress strikes and such troubles. They possibly are averse to taking medicine, but it remains to be seen whether law and order or riot shall rule in this State.

LABOR Commissioner Fitzgerald has sensibly reached the conclusion that it is of little use to have a law passed requiring bakers to keep their establishments in a cleanly and sanitary condition. He rightly concludes that a system of inspection is a much better means of protecting the public. Accordingly, he proposes a supervision of bakeries, and will issue to those deserving patronage a certificate of cleanliness and good order. This should serve the purpose of protecting the intelligent classes of the community from the risk of consuming filth with their daily bread.

GOVERNOR BUDD deserves credit for his open condemnation of the manner in which the State fairs at Sacramento are conducted. These annual exhibitions consist in reality of little more than horse-racing, with some slight show of agricultural and horticultural products. The interest centers at the track, and gamblers and swindlers of all descriptions reap a harvest from the crowds that swarm upon the grounds. As hitherto conducted, these fairs have been a disgrace to the State, and have done far more to promote gambling than to encourage agriculture. Naturally, the people of Sacramento are "anxious" to have the fairs maintained, but this is simply because the annual show brings business to the town, however great may be the detriment to morality.

EASTERN opinion is almost unanimously condemnatory of the late vituperation heaped by Senator Tillman, of South Carolina, upon President Cleveland. Republican journals of repute, as well as Democratic, also voice the sentiment that, in playing to the gallery, the Senator not only overstepped the line of common decency, but committed an outrageous and uncalled for attack upon the man who stands for the embodiment of all authority. Senator Tillman belongs to an ever growing class of men willing, for the furtherance of their own personal interests, to hazard the welfare of the general masses whom they profess to represent. It is a good sign when one of these instigators to violence and enemies to law and order receives the castigation he so richly deserves.

REFUNDING PROPOSITIONS SIMPLIFIED.

IN the early sixties, the Congress and people of the United States became earnestly seized with the idea that a great transcontinental railroad from ocean to ocean was necessary to the safety and unity of the nation. Certain men were named to carry out the cherished enterprise, and, of course, the important consideration of ways and means had to be taken into account. Bonds were issued and the necessary money raised. The first series of bonds do not bear the Government's guarantee, but were constituted a first lien upon the railroad property. The second lot of bonds were indorsed by the Government, and are payable by it. They were given the legal status of second mortgages on the road bed from Ogden to San Jose. Those second bonds are now about to become due and payable, and the question now arises as to what had better be done in regard to them. That is, in a few words, the problem that Congress is called upon to solve.

Three rival propositions hold the field. First—to foreclose the Government's second, or subsidiary lien, and sell it to the highest bidder. Second—the Government to buy up or become responsible for the first mortgage bonds, assume possession of the road and operate it, or cause it to be operated on its own account, and third—to refund the whole debt (on which six per cent is now being paid) at about three per cent., which the Government could easily do in the present state of its credit, and then contract with the present managers of the road to assume responsibility for the Government's liability for the principal and interest, as it becomes due, of the bonds so refunded; they (the managers) giving further security for the due fulfillment of their agreement, and provision being made for the creation by them of a sinking fund, and for a return of the property to the Government in case of any default being made in the payment of interest as it accrues.

The first of these propositions is that for which Mayor Sutro and young Mr. Hearst are fighting for with such unbouded energy and amplitude of funds. It is in the interests of an Eastern combination, in which the Vanderbilts and Goulds are obviously interested, and has for its ultimate purpose the control of the Union and Central Pacific by what is known as the North Western System. The more it is examined the more clearly it will be seen to be a proposition without merit. Under it the roads would be bought for little more than the first mortgage, and the Government would be out and injured to the extent of nearly its whole obligation. That, and the revengeful replacing of the California owners by Eastern ones, is all there is to that proposition.

The second proposal may be said to be that of the cranks, whom more designing men think it necessary to conciliate in order to secure their voice and influence in the defeat of any possible wise and conservative refunding scheme. Refunding out of the way, foreclosure becomes inevitable, and a possibility is opened up for the success of the Eastern syndicate of conspirators. That our Government, constituted as it is, could operate the roads, either by itself, or through any conceivable agency it could call into existence, is one of the wildest of imaginings, and merits no place in a serious controversy.

The remaining proposal is that which long ago emanated from the men who originally built the Central Pacific, developed its trade, and extended its branches, until they tapped almost every valley of the State, and connected it with all the great sections of our common country. It is not at all difficult to understand that these men, or the heirs and survivors of them, might years since have found it pecuniarily advantageous to have abandoned the road-bed from Ogden to San Jose to such uses as the Government, or the first bond holders, might choose to make of it. That road bed is not practically necessary to the men of the Southern Pacific. They own a better, because a much more cheaply operated trans-continental line. They, moreover, own all the side lines, feeders, ferries, terminals, water fronts, rolling stock, and whatever else is necessary to such a complex carrying trade as the needs of this great section call for. Nothing, therefore, would be easier than for them to say "let that old road-bed go. To retain it will cost twice as much as we can duplicate it for, and will lead to interminable conflicts with politicians and the people. Better let it go." Palpably, that is what it would profit the Southern Pacific to say and mean right now. The reason why it never has been said does immortal honor to the memory of those of the original builders of the Central Pacific who have departed this life, and everlasting credit to the name of the one who remains to battle, not for further gains of which he has no need, nor for earthly honors or enjoyments for which, in the nature of things, he can have but little further use, but who desires, as his dead partners desired, to make provision for the ultimate payment of every dollar invested by the Government, or by anybody, in the great enterprise which spanned the continent, unified the extreme limits of the nation, extorted the wonder of the world, and will yet give immortality to the great names of Stanford, Crocker, Hopkins, and Huntington. To those who can put aside the worked up and manufactured passion of the hour, and look with unclouded reason upon the scene, there is something inspiring in the way this grand old man—Huntington—is to-day fighting to have the debts of the Central Pacific liquidated to the last dollar in the only way that it has ever been possible to liquidate them. No great railroad in this country or any other has ever repaid its first cost within twenty-five years of its construction. If any such result had been expected and demanded, this country would have had to have waited centuries yet for the railroads it has to-day. It is enough for a young country to pay interest on the capital value of its public utilities, and to wait until it has filled up and built up before paying for their first cost. Posterity, numerous and prosperous as it will be, will find a way to pay for its great heritage, and, we think, will have no reason to lament the greatness or profitableness of the achievements of this age in which we live. Be that as it may, there is no present reason why the Central Pacific owners should be asked to do the impossible, or to be treated by the Government in a manner in which no private creditor thinks of treating his debtor. The original security for the debt is not only intact, but has been greatly bettered. To that security it is proposed to make invaluable additions. The Government is asked to extend the period for which it has loaned its credit; simply that and nothing more. If this is granted, the continuity of the railroad service will be maintained, and trade will flourish. If it be refused, chaos will have come again, and no man can tell the end.

Sobriety For some time past very direct allusions in have been made in certain of our Eastern exchanges to the bibulous habits of more than one United States Senator, charged with appearing in their seats in a condition bordering on helpless intoxication. Senator Morgan, of Alabama, is said to be the principal offender. It is alleged that he is rarely or never sober, and some very unhappy stories are told of his condition in Paris when attending the International Bi-metallic Congress. It is further charged that his colleagues have frequently feared to meet with him in Committees, whose business has had to be postponed in consequence. The subject matter being alluded to by the New York press, led the Boston Herald to unwisely put in a plea for toleration in this wise: "Some of the greatest men of our country have had this habit of drinking heavily. It has gone into history as a weakness in their character, but the mantle of charity was always drawn over it by their contemporaries." This causes the New York Nation to wax indignant enough to say: "Well, the 'mantle of charity' was grossly misused when it was cast over this 'weakness.' Anyhow, whatever excuse a public man may have had for 'drinking heavily' fifty years ago, he has none to-day. If he cannot stop it, he ought to get out of public life. It is preposterous to make abstinence a condition of employment in an engineer of a locomotive, or in a captain of a liner, and allow a statesman, whose blunders may bring on a bloody war, to get drunk as often as he pleases, and then whine for the 'mantle of charity.' We believe we are the only civilized people to-day who allow men high in office to roll in the gutter with impunity." It makes the matter none the better that Senator Morgan is a leading member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, until lately, was its chairman. If there be one place more than another where strict sobriety should prevail, it is in the Committee charged with the issues of peace and war.

Women Above the Law.

It is odd that there should be surprise at the acquittal on her second trial of Mrs. Shattuck, murderess of Harry Ponder. The freeing of this woman, mother of a chorus girl, who slew a young man as innocent as her daughter, is strictly in accord with precedent. The exasperation of Judge Belcher at the equally foolish and wicked verdict is curious. As a lawyer and citizen he must know that to women in this State is given the power of life and death over men. It is true that the laws by their language put both sexes on an equality, but juries, through whom custom expresses itself, have decreed that murder done by a female is no murder. This is so well recognized that men who desire to assassinate enemies, now and again put forward a wife or mistress to do the killing, confident that no very unpleasant legal results will ensue. That which is a hanging matter for a man, even in this city, where we have fifty murders for one execution, means for a woman only a year or two's imprisonment—or just long enough to give the courts and a second jury time to become accustomed to her.

Stung by Judge Belcher's scornful language, the jurors in the Shattuck case are quarreling about the apportionment of blame for the verdict. Jurors Kittredge and Muller aver that while they wanted to convict the woman of murder in the first degree, they voted for acquittal because they saw there would be a disagreement else, and they desired to save the county the expense of another trial! Juror Ashe resented the introduction into the jury-room of evidence not admitted in the court-room. All the jurors who have spoken appear to have arrived at their conclusion without much reference to the testimony, and to have made no use whatever of their heads. One declared his belief that the woman had suffered enough, and that sympathetic view doubtless in large degree controlled the whole twelve. Had the chorus girl's father, instead of her mother, killed her lover, the jury would not have been so pitiful, or if disposed to be so, would have mastered their pity out of respect for the public wrath which would descend upon them for a criminally kind verdict. In dealing with the mother they counted on public applause, or, at worst, apathy.

The average Californian juror is a chivalrous ass. The murderess invariably derives advantage from the deference that he feels for the whole sex, which is relatively scarce and hard to get in his habitat. To his muddled, undeveloped brain it appears that he is paying a compliment to Woman when by his vote he testifies his conviction that she is not a responsible being. If this juror were hunting monkeys for food he would lower his gun on perceiving the simian in the tree to be female. He is a high-toned, elegant gentleman under all circumstances, drunk or sober.

It is not well that the laws of a community should be at variance with its public opinion. Nothing being better established by experience than that a woman in California cannot be seriously punished for serious crime, this principle ought to be incorporated into the statutes. Then the laws would be spared that contempt which is brought upon them by non-enforcement. But while things remain as they are, a decent respect for human reason dictates that each Judge shall keep a list of moral runts and intellectual ciphers such as acquitted murderess Shattuck, and bar them from jury duty until the laws have been based on sexual sympathy and not common sense. The Shattuck jurors, in a truly civilized community, would be locked up as dangerous. Among us they will receive the grateful smiles of the New Woman, which is, perhaps, punishment enough.

Let Perdita Alone.

The Examiner is stirring up the preachers to another agitation against the social evil. The paper is not doing this because it cares anything about the social evil, but because it needs in its business at the moment some appearance of moral sense. It has been shocking the city, which is not easily shocked, by its manner of reporting the murder of a courtesan on Morton street. This crime gave the Examiner an opportunity to take out the walls of the town's vilest houses of ill-fame and replace them with glass, so that even the school children could study the interiors, down to the smallest particular of furniture as well as of life. Work so unnecessary and so very dirty has never been done by another San Francisco paper. People, to the Examiner's surprise, have not been entertained by this uncovering of the social sewers, but disgusted and angered. Consequently the order to back water is given, and the ail of the clergy is called in to lend an air of worthy purpose to the monstrous performances of this journalistic bawd. And the clergy at once respond, of course. It is as safe to open fire on the scarlet women as it was to revile the Mormons. They have no friends who can hurt the churches. Besides, it is an easy subject to talk on. The Rev. Dr. Case, we see, is especially vehement in his righteous wrath against Morton street—the same Dr. Case, who but two weeks ago was pleading for merciful judgment of Dr. Brown from his chaste pulpit. He pointed to the moral lapses of Solomon and other Old Testament worthies, and God's tolerance of them, as examples of what the attitude of the pious should be toward preachers who break the seventh commandment and then lie about it. But he would be stern with the non-clerical sinner. "I would," he confides to his friend, the Examiner, "arrest every man seen going into the doors of such an establishment, and have him sentenced to thirty-nine lashes at the whipping-post. If that dose of castigation were not sufficient it should be repeated." For a brother in the Lord, however, who numbers Miss Overman and Mrs. Stockton among his congregation, there shall be no whipping-post, but at the very worst a suspension of judgment.

It is needless to say that the interviewed clergy, while declaiming against Morton street, are exceedingly shy about suggesting an alternative. That is why the less that is said about Morton street the better. Pending a proposition to remove the women to a district remote from the center of the city, and frankly to place them under proper police and medical regulation, these periodical agitations against the social evil effect no good purpose. On the contrary, they merely advertise that which should be hidden, and drench with filth the newspapers, and so carry pollution into uncounted homes. Yet were it attempted to isolate the women, to control and mitigate an evil which it is impossible—human nature and social institutions being what they are—to extirpate, who would be the first to cry out in a frenzy against this "recognition" of sin, as if recognition with the intention to lessen were a joyous and shameful encouragement? The clergy, of course—Brother Case, Brother Brown, Brother Pond, and all the good men of their sort.

They tire, these reverend chatterers, who seem to be as deficient in sense as they are in real moral perception. Morton street is foul, foul beyond even the Examiner's power, though not its willingness, to describe, but why stir up with the stick of useless publicity this foulness for which no remedy is proposed? The closing of Morton street would result simply in defiling other neighborhoods which are now clean. Morton street does not obtrude itself upon those who are not seeking it. It is not a hundredth part so conspicuous as the Rev. Dr. Brown has been these two months. Until a reservation for its wretched inhabitants has been provided, Morton street should be let alone. And, for the sake of decency, the Examiner and its co-workers, the sensational preachers, should be taught that it is to the interest of their highly moral pockets to seek clearer themes.

Socialism Adopted By The Labor Unions.

The growth of socialism in America was strongly illustrated in the proceedings of the recent labor convention in this city. The gathering was composed of delegates from the various trade unions of San Francisco. It adjourned for a month, without taking final action in relation to a plan of campaign, but decided that organized labor should engage in politics. Resolutions were unanimously adopted condemning the "competitive system of industry" as "the capitalist's plan of private exploitation of those deprived of tools and land," and declaring that this competitive system is "the fundamental cause of industrial distress and economic slavery of the masses of the workers." It was further resolved that the workers should "proceed to organize their federated forces on such lines as are best calculated to supplant competition and its fraudulent fundamentals, and to substitute therefore a system of universal coöperation founded on the socialization of the means of production—land, tools and capital." In conclusion, the convention declared in favor of "such distinct political action as will forever throw off the yoke of our capitalist masters." It is significant of the cowardice of the daily press that while much space was given to the report of the proceedings of the convention, the editorial columns of the newspapers have remained silent on the subject of this radical departure by the labor representatives. If this convention be fairly an exponent of the drift of sentiment in the ranks of what is called "organized labor" in America, the inevitable struggle against socialism is not far distant. The programme, as laid down in the resolutions adopted, embodies the cant with which students of socialism have become familiar. The capitalist is held up to execration as a plunderer of the laborer, and there is a sweeping demand for a general "divide." The "socialization of the means of production—land, tools, and capital"—means, in plain English, a confiscation of property for the benefit of those who are impecunious. Is it not clear that the men who proclaim these sentiments would immediately proceed to put them into operation, had they the power to do so? If the accumulation of capital be robbery, the sooner the capital is distributed, per capita, the better it should be for the body politic. This is the logical application of the principles laid down by the labor convention. No doubt the growth of these ideas in California was greatly promoted by the policy of most of our newspapers during the great railroad strike of 1894. Every encouragement was then given to train-wreckers and others engaged in organized effort against the tyranny of capital. And now that labor unions have begun to learn that there is little or nothing to be gained by the old weapons of strikes and boycotts, the adoption of the socialist program, and its introduction into national politics, is a consequence to be apprehended. It is not unlikely that the socialist-labor party, by whatever name it may be distinguished, will in a few years become a formidable factor in the politics of the United States, as it already is in Germany. The demagogues who have sown the seed may have a chance to reap the whirlwind.

No Reliance Upon Arbitration. The advocates of arbitration, as a means of settling international difficulties, are again to the front. It is proposed that England and the United States provide for the establishment of a permanent board of arbitration, for the pacific adjustment of international controversies. This would be a thing most devoutly to be wished, if it could be relied upon as a safeguard against war. Unfortunately, however, neither nation would agree to submit all disputes to such a tribunal, or to be bound in all cases by its decisions. This is the weak point of international arbitration. There is never much support for the idea save at times when no event has occurred to stir the popular heart. When an actual cause for war is visible, the people are too deeply moved to be willing to trust to arbitration. Only a short time ago this country and England were, in a twinkling, brought almost to the verge of war by President Cleveland's famous Venezuela message. The spirit manifested in America at that time did not speak well for the progress of the arbitration gospel. It is always so when national pride or national honor is wounded. At such times suggestions for arbitration become mere waste of words. No Government has ever left to arbitration what is regarded as a matter of vital importance. Arbitration is best suited to such comparatively small questions as those relating to the Alaska seal, and even over that animal this country narrowly escaped a serious difficulty with England.

As for the idea of "compulsory" arbitration, sometimes advocated, it should scarcely be necessary to point out that it involves a confusion of terms. Voluntary submission of a dispute to an impartial tribunal is the essential principle of arbitration, when compulsion exists there can be no real arbitration. Compulsion implies force, and force in a military sense cannot be exerted without armament. So long as the nations continue at all times to make preparations for war, the country least equipped must remain at a disadvantage. Even if all the nations of Europe could be induced to unite with America in an agreement for the arbitration of all international questions, there would always be danger that some one of them, and that the strongest, would on occasion refuse to be bound by an award. What then? The tribunal could not enforce its decision. Thus the most honorable and the most peaceful of nations would be apt to fall a victim to the wiles of the least trustworthy or most combative. As is commonly illustrated in arbitration of disputes between individuals, evasion of the requirements of an award is easy to the dishonest. Nor are arbitrators always free from reasonable suspicion as to motives or bias. It would be a dangerous thing for this country to rely upon the growth of international sentiment in favor of arbitration. Bismarck's famous "blood and iron" form a much more effectual safeguard for any nation. It is clear that the nation best prepared for war is least in danger of the sword. The time of a general disarmament and universal peace is as far off as the millenium. It will do no harm to preach the gospel of arbitration, but we must beware lest at some time a first-class fighting power provoke a war when we are unprepared to so much as protect our coasts.

Equitable Water Rates. The Board of Supervisors has decided that the water rates for the ensuing year shall not be decreased, but shall remain as they are at present, being according to the schedule adopted by the Board in February of last year. Strangely enough, this action has not brought forth the usual denunciation from the daily press, clamoring for reduction, without sufficient thought being given the service rendered. This action on the part of the Supervisors is probably due to the fact that they studied the financial report of the Spring Valley Water Company, lately issued, and which showed that the Company's workings last year had even resulted in a loss. The Spring Valley Water Company is fulfilling its duty to the city and the general public in the best possible manner. Although at a somewhat late period, the papers are becoming aware of this fact. They see that attacking solid corporations and the men at the head of them only hurts their own pockets, as well as retards the development of California. Eastern capitalists are not likely to invest their money where they will be subject to the abuse heaped upon them by a demagogic press, and people of moderate means follow largely their example.

Had the newspapers of San Francisco only become aware of this fact some twenty years ago instead of to-day, and had shaped their policy on broad and useful lines by helping our large water, gas, and railroad corporations along in their endeavors to build up this State, instead of indulging in abuse at their expense, then instead of having only one million inhabitants California would certainly have two, and probably even three or four. Thus, cost for all accommodation would be less; factories would be in operation everywhere, and we should be producing here those goods for which we are still dependent upon the East. Even the daily papers themselves would be bettered because they would have a larger circulation and more advertising patronage. Finally, every Western industry would be better off, hard times would be unknown, the "tramp problem" would be settled, and the prospect for the future would be healthy in every respect. A worse policy than that of wholesale corporation hunting cannot well be imagined.

Defective Sanitation. Two of the leading public schools, the Lincoln and the Longfellow, are closed, owing to the fearful sanitary defects found to exist in them. Diphtheria, scarlet fever, and other zymotic diseases are rampant among the children subjected to foul air, bad sewerage, and dirty water pipes. This state of affairs appeals directly to every parent in the city, for, if present conditions be not remedied, the lives of thousands of school children may be sacrificed and their health imperilled in the hey-day of their youth. The Board of Education, the Supervisors, and the Board of Health are all equally responsible for this monstrous blot on the community, and it is to be hoped they will take speedy action in the matter.

The Irish Home Rulers are persisting in their usual methods of attacking and harassing the British Government. Until abler and more reliable men can be found to attend to the interests of Ireland, things had better remain as they are.

Confidential Communications

The Circuit Court of Michigan lately decided that a Judge has the power to compel a doctor to reveal confidential communications made to him by a patient regarding his bodily condition. The question is an interesting one and is causing much discussion between the two parties. Glenn in his "Manual of the Laws affecting Medical Men" states that a medical man has no privilege to avoid giving such evidence when called upon by the Court so to do. This is what is open to doubt. Before a patient can feel perfect reliance in his physician and will take him into full confidence, he must feel assured that the confidence will not be misplaced and that no third party will ever become aware of the nature of his complaint. This is the basis of all relations between the two parties and without it half the diseases, at present prevalent, would be suppressed from the knowledge of the doctors and would thus secretly endanger the community. There is no doubt of the fact that should the average physician learn facts that might lead to the conviction of a murderer or some other fugitive from justice, being an honorable man he would of himself impart them to those holding authority above him. But it would be well not to subject him to law in this case, but rather let him decide whether his knowledge would be of any use or not. At any rate, even if he is compelled to state what he knows concerning a man, the information he may give should be for the Judge's ears alone and not for those of the hullyguy counsel and the inquisitive reporter.

Viewing the matter from the side of the patient, it might even be good to make it a criminal offense upon the part of any doctor to disclose whatever knowledge comes to him whilst acting in his capacity of medical adviser. Cases have been known where doctors resorted to blackmail when once in possession of certain questionable facts concerning their patients. To punish such violations of confidence with a long term of imprisonment would be to doubly protect the patient and remove a temptation from the path of his adviser.

Sanitary Reform.

Inspector Dockery has done much for the prevention of disease caused by the sale of impure and adulterated milk in this city, but New York eclipses us entirely in its methods of guarding the public from abuse by fraudulent milkmen. A late amendment to the Sanitary Code of that city provides that no milk shall be sold or kept for sale by anyone without a permit so to do signed by the Board of Health. Before this permit is issued the Board investigates the respective dairies and should they not comply with specified regulations as to cleanliness and order the permit is refused. This method of procedure is far superior to ours as it strikes at the very root of all evil—unhealthy cows and filthy surroundings. So much sickness is traceable to the consumption of bad milk nowadays, that it behooves us to adopt the most stringent of measures to protect ourselves from the evil. Another good resolution adopted is one prohibiting expectoration upon the floors of public places. Placards, calling the attention of people to this, are to be prominently posted in all places where men congregate, and proper receptacles are to be provided and continually cleansed. The habit of promiscuous expectoration is not only unhealthy but is also a dirty one, causing much inconvenience to ladies whose garments trail along the ground and sweep up much with which they come in contact. The habit is a common one here where the influences of the forty-niner are still apparent; but with proper legislation and a strict enforcement of the laws wonders could be performed in a very short time. The two subjects are well worth the consideration of people interested in reforms and if the members of our Board of Health will take action in the matter they can feel assured of the sympathy and backing of the better part of the community.

The Church Council.

There is everywhere an expectation that the ecclesiastical court summoned to try the Reverend Dr. Brown will free him. Everywhere, also, there is a conviction that Brown is guilty. The assumption is that the clergymen and laymen composing the court are of a moral and mental order which renders them more solicitous for what they deem the interests of the church than they are for ordinary justice and ordinary morals. Therefore, the Congregational Church is on trial as well as Dr. Brown. The trial is public, and the community, having the evidence before it, will be quite as competent as the court to form a judgment of its value. If that evidence is conclusive, and Dr. Brown shall still be acquitted, Congregationalism will receive a blow as punishing as deserved. To the people the fact will be made known that the church, instead of being superior morally to the mass of men, is distinctly inferior—so inferior, indeed, that men and women regardful of their reputation will keep away from it.

It goes without saying that if the evidence should prove the innocence of Dr. Brown the public would rejoice in his exoneration by the court; but if the evidence shall be at all the same as that which has appeared in the newspapers, and the brush should be applied, the court would not make Dr. Brown white, but itself black. The temptation will be strong to shuffle and arm Dr. Brown with a record of technical acquittal, with which he can sneak away and find another pulpit at a distance. But that would be equivalent to sending among unoffending strangers a leper carrying a certificate of health. It would be a crime.

The public has not nearly so vital an interest in the outcome of this trial as have the churches. The latter are on view for judgment, and should the court be merciful to proved adultery, falsehood, slander, and brazen impudence, the cost to the household of faith will be very great. Kindness to Dr. Brown, guilty, will be cruelty to Christianity and an affront to the good sense and moral feeling of all men and women whose sense of right and wrong has not been perverted by a pious environment.

Animal Murder.

It is a common thing in this city as well as in all others of the Union, for members of the medical profession to buy cats and other helpless animals for anatomical purposes, the price paid being usually about twenty cents for each. He who will wilfully mutilate a harmless, domestic little creature in the so-called interests of science, is not worthy the name of man. He is lower than the brute, for the brute will only kill its kind in self-defense or when instigated thereto by the cravings of hunger. He is rather a fiend, whose heart and soul alike are perverted, and whose savage instincts—refined yet accentuated by the demands of our civilization—can only be satisfied by the sight of blood and the sufferings of his victim. The usefulness of vivisection is being called into question daily more and more. Reputable physicians and other intelligent and humane people are raising their voices in protest against it and it is to be hoped that in the near future it will fall into disrepute altogether.

Our Holy Grail.

"Well, what of it? What's the use?" is the Philistine's greeting to the news that Nansen has discovered the North Pole. The Pole can't be sold, and the climate forbids that helting should be attached to the revolving thing and machinery turned. There is no money visible in the North Pole, so it is scorned. The courage it took to get there, the daring, the endurance, the manly indifference to life in the pursuit of an idea not sordid, compels no admiration from the Philistine. An exclusive devotion to business is as deadening to the heart and imagination as exclusive devotion to the hottle. Useless or not, the North Pole is the modern Holy Grail, and the knight who first reaches it will, somehow, excite in the generality of men a thrill which could not be awakened by a regiment of millionaires marching to the clinking music of a gold band. The race is still human.

Merely A Combination!

The Central Pacific Lumber Company of California has been organized, representing a combination of lumbering concerns having a total capital of seventy million dollars. The public are assured, through a published interview, that the new organization "is not a trust"—merely a combination. Incidentally, it is hinted that the price of lumber will immediately be advanced $2 a thousand feet, to enable the lumbering interest to preserve itself from decay. Perhaps the new company is not a trust, in a technical sense but it is evidently planning a cinch upon the public.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

EDITOR NEWS LETTER, Sir:—In the Overland Monthly for the present month of February, in an article on "Hard Times" Mr. Irving M. Scott says:

Europe, from early times down to a late date, employed both gold and silver as the "standard of value." This country in its colonial and confederate conditions did the same. The United States from the foundation of the Government (constitutional) down to 1873, employed both gold and silver, in accord with an Act of Congress making the standard unit of value "One Dollar," of a certain fineness. Thus, from 1687 to 1873, embracing a period of 186 years, our country employed both the silver dollar and the gold dollar—equal one to the other—as the standard unit of value and as redemption money. Thus it is seen that from time immemorial gold and silver worked together harmoniously. A greater production of one or the other did not affect the parity established between them.

Such an assertion by a business man of Mr. Scott's intelligence and standing is astounding, for the facts are exactly the opposite. In India at the time of Alexander's invasion, silver to gold was as 2 to 1, but in consequence of the rapid extension of commerce the ratio soon reached 6 to 1. In Athens, at the zenith of her power, the ratio at one time reached 13 to 1. At a little earlier period the ratio with the Romans was 10 to 1. They allowed the Eolians to pay their annual tribute in either silver or gold at this ratio. Between the fifth and thirteenth centuries, the great national formative period, gold was hoarded, and though Byzantine, Arabian, Egyptian and Spanish-Moorish gold coins were to be found in circulation occasionally, there was no gold coinage by western Europe until the close of the twelfth or beginning of the thirteenth century, the impetus having been given by the Crusaders. There never was agreement in the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth centuries and the sudden yield of money metals by the new world utterly upset the mintage ratios of all Europe during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. There never was anything like an equal and generally recognized ratio of value between gold and silver prevailing at any single point of time. At one and the same date a ratio of 7 or 8 to 1 prevailed in the Moorish parts of Spain, and 12 to 1 in the Christian parts (the kingdom of Castile). Similarly, at a later period, in 1474, the ratio in England was 11.15; in Germany 11.12; and in France 11.00; in Italy 10.58, and in Spain 9.20. Vasco de Gama found the ratio prevailing in South America with the Indians 8 to 1. Changes of ratio in Europe under the influence of new world metallic product, are indicated by the following figures:

1545-60.....	11.30 to 1	1621-40.....	14.00 to 1
1561-80.....	11.50 to 1	1641-60.....	14.50 to 1
1581-1600.....	11.80 to 1	1661.....	15.00 to 1
1601-20.....	12.25 to 1

Or from 1545 to 1660, a period of one hundred and fifteen years, the ratios of the two metals varied 33 per cent. And it is reasonably certain that all important monetary transactions in England prior to the Elizabethan reformation of the coinage, under Gresham, were settled by weight, and not by tale.

Lord Liverpool, writing in 1805, says:

The price of silver in dollars has varied in twenty three years,—that is, from the end of the year 1774 to the 31st of December, 1797—11-113. 117 per cent; and even in the course of one year, that of 1797, no less than 9 1-6 per cent. The variation in the price of silver bullion appears to have been still greater, by another account, with which I have been favored, by the later Mr. Garbett, an eminent merchant and manufacturer at Birmingham; it there appears that silver purchased by him, as a refiner, varied, according to his calculation, in the course of ten years, to 1793, more than 19 1-4 per cent., and in one year alone more than 13 1-3 per cent.

In the five hundred years, from the fourteenth to the eighteenth century, inclusive, there were over four hundred changes of re-ratings throughout continental Europe; and even a cursory knowledge of the history of coinage of the last five hundred years in the world will show that not alone has bimetalism, with free coinage, failed in Europe, but it failed also in India; that two distinct attempts were made there, both of which resulted disastrously.

Apart altogether from the arbitrary debasement of the coin, apart even from the changes of the ratio enacted with the more crafty design of inducing a flow of gold, the monetary systems of the times were so rough, so unscientific; the tariffing of the coins of different nations against each other so inexact, of so hasty average, that it was simply impossible to provide general tables of equivalents of coins. The mint conventions of contiguous states in Europe in the sixteenth century were so frequent that their history has been characterized as a jungle of intricacies. A modern writer has said that to pick out and enumerate all the changes of ratings in Europe in a period of 600 years—the thirteenth to the eighteenth centuries inclusive—would be like counting the stars in the Milky Way. And in France, the criterion of the silverites, there were 150 changes in less than that number of years in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. During the French Revolution the ratings of gold and silver were changed over sixty times with no effect whatever save to cheat the people. In that country gold only was full legal tender or in effective circulation from 1850 to 1873, and from 1820 to 1850 silver expelled gold, achieving a proportion as currency of 91 to 9. Said the Chevalier Baisse in his "Problem of Gold" written in 1859:

A change of 1 1-2 per cent. in favor of gold sufficed, thirty or forty years ago, to cause that metal to disappear wholly from commercial payments. Under the regime of the Law of the 7th Germinal, year XI (1803), gold has ceased to figure in transactions of any magnitude, since it had acquired an appreciable premium. People took their gold to the money changer, in order to pocket the premium, and made payments exclusively in silver, as every investigator knows.

Gold and silver never have circulated freely, concurrently and indiscriminately as coins at fixed ratios under unrestricted coinage. As Mr. Scott, in the article mentioned, practically advises this country to abandon the Gold Standard and adopt the unlimited free coinage of Silver, presumably at a ratio of 16 to 1, which is about twice its actual value and which means cheap silver monometallism—I beg permission to ask him, most respectfully, what effect he believes such a policy would have upon the welfare of the men whom he employs, and also upon that of the people of California whose earnings of a life-time are to a considerable extent represented by the hundred and seventy-five millions of deposits on a gold basis in the savings and commercial banks of this State. In other words, does he really believe that his workmen, or anybody's workmen, or the people at large, would be benefited by being paid their wages, or their deposits in banks, on a depreciated silver basis, instead of a gold basis, as now?

In the Elizabethan reformation of the English coinage under Sir Thomas Gresham in the sixteenth century, the Queen, in her proclamation, said: "The loss in the base money falls principally on pensioners, soldiers, hired servants, and other poor people who live by any kind of wages, and not by rents of land or trade or merchandise." I take the liberty of subscribing to that doctrine and trust that our serious second thought, Mr. Scott also will perceive its truth, because it is in accordance with a natural law as inexorable as gravitation.

To paraphrase a writer of the day: The trouble in this country is not a lack of money, but of a sound economic and financial policy, which has, since the Civil War, been an almost unbroken record of empiricism, carried on in wanton disregard of the best established inductions of science.

A LAYMAN.

MAYFLOWERS.—ALICE L'ANSON IN LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

PURITAN mayflowers creeping,
Clad in their virginal white;
Puritan mayflowers peeping
Timidly up at the light;
Cheered by its ray, day after day,
Softly their petals unclose;
And as they part, each to its heart
Gathers the tint of the rose.

Gone are the colony's daughters,
With the dainty kerchiefs of yore;
Here by the Atlantic's broad waters
They are beholden no more.
Here away blows the summer's wild rose;
Blossoms fill copsewood and glade;
But the fairest that blow are the blossoms of snow—
Types of the Puritan maid.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

COMPARATIVELY few San Franciscans are familiar with the picturesque spots of their own city. The reason for this is that the points of interest are so many and so varied in their respective qualifications, that each person learns to love one little portion of it, and is liable to leave the others to the admiration of his fellows. This is surely not right. The designers of a building, to be assured of its ultimate success, must know its every part, its every detail, and it is the same in every respect with the city. We are the makers of San Francisco, and to ensure its future greatness it behooves each person to learn the lesson of its different aspects, to become acquainted with its numberless beauties, and so feel doubly sure of the outcome of the work for which we all are striving.

Taking all this into consideration, and desiring to awaken in the hearts of the people that interest in the city which has long lain fallow, the NEWS LETTER will issue a series of panoramic and artistic views, showing the points of interest of San Francisco, and calling attention to the people whose worthy enterprise has made each separate locality what it is.

The photographs from which these illustrations will be made were finished specially for the NEWS LETTER, and are the finest that could possibly be taken. The artist has been engaged on them several months, selecting only the clearest days on which to work, and using the most critical judgment in the choice of the views. The result is an illustrative series, the like of which has never been seen in this city before.

One full page illustration of some well-known locality will appear each week, printed on heavy plate paper, the utmost attention being paid to the smallest detail, and the series will be continued until every picturesque spot in the city has been dealt with, and the different styles of architecture, giving each its individuality, described.

Many of our readers have friends in the East and abroad who are interested in San Francisco, but they have as yet never had the opportunity to become thoroughly acquainted with this city. These illustrations will be found to fill a long felt want, and it is recommended that copies of the NEWS LETTER for the next few months be forwarded them regularly, so that they can see for themselves what a beautiful city ours is, and thus be induced to come here and reside.

As the illustrations will form an album, the workmanship in each making them worthy of preservation, portfolios have been made, and can be obtained at the business office.

The first plate, which accompanies this issue, is a view taken from the Hopkins Institute of Art, and beautifully depicts several of the artistic homes on California-street Hill—the brown stone structure of James Flood, C. P. Huntington's house, formerly the Colton residence, the late Charles Crocker's mansion, and W. H. Crocker's lovely home. The view next week will show that portion of the city from the same point looking towards Telegraph Hill.

Probably A Mistake. A few days ago some seventy gallons of milk, belonging to the California Milk Producers' Association, was condemned by the Milk Inspector as impure, and emptied into the bay. This action has caused much surprise among the dairy men as the milk supplied by this Association is known to be of the finest quality only, and entirely above suspicion. At the office of the Association, 428-430 Turk street, it was learned that the cans must have been tampered with by malicious persons, who will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law when discovered. The Association claims for its milk and cream absolute purity, having 37,600 acres of the finest pasture land in Marin County, on which 3,535 cows find the purest and most wholesome fodder. In order to find out what impurities, if any, existed in the milk at the time, samples have been submitted to Professor Price, the well-known analytical chemist, and the public will soon be apprised of the results of his investigations. Of the seventy gallons seized, twenty gallons were part of a lot of 140 gallons, but, strange to say, the 120 gallons was passed as perfectly pure.

THE Paderewski matinees, given for and crowded by women, have been conspicuously repressed, even chill of atmosphere. Thrills, spinal or otherwise, have quivered their modest tributes to art unseen and unsung. The stories from the East of women's wild raptures and unseemly chase for the palpitating Pole, have enforced a self-consciousness and restraint among our femininity that have made of thrills something to be considered immodest, shameless, even prurient. I glanced over the house on Friday afternoon, and I saw one wan spinster who relaxed into tears under pressure of the funeral march which solemnizes the great Chopin sonata (who knows, perhaps the poor old girl was re-burying some unrequited passion to those melancholic strains); I saw the Paderewski girl etched by Alice Rix when she started, sobbing, from her chair, and I discovered a Paderewski girl of my own, who released a single ecstatic "Gawd!" dungeoned for possibly the entire Paderewski season behind her clenched teeth. The rest of the audience sat crowded, silent, and expensive; alive only to applaud decorously at the end of each number. And the Slavic thriller, in his faded hair and dingy clothes, might have been a plaster Apollo, for all he seemed to care. Only the gleaming ivories beneath his fingers had existence for him.

It is easier by far to write of Paderewski's thrills and throbs than of his playing. He defies analysis, and each new concert attests his boundless breadth and versatility of conception. The recital given last Friday week had a particularly stroung programme. Prominent were: Beethoven's E flat souata, Chopin's immortal minor sonata, Liszt's 12th Rhapsodje, and Schumann's Carnival—what a quartette to be served out at one feast! And what a master to be complete in the rendition of each! We read a great deal of vague praise of Paderewski for his artistic fidelity to the composers' ideas; from which one might infer that the writers were in direct communication with Beethoven, Chopin, and all the great band of dead musicians. I am just as impertinent and impudent as any of my brother scribes, but I draw the line at visitations from skeletons that long ago have been eaten by their graves. Paderewski interprets Beethoven as only a great, broad-souled, marvelously-schooled genius can. If any fragment of that illustrious composer remains intact, and the ears of it could hear eight bars of a sonata by Paderewski on the modern piano of to-day, I dare say it would turn for joy many eighteenth century flip-flops in its mouldy resting place. Nor would Chopin grieve for Poland's art could he hear his poems read by his long-haired countryman.

Wednesday's concert was distinctive from its predecessors by the absence of a Beethoven number, Schumann's first sonata being the chef d'œuvre. The many changeful phases, the abrupt introductions of contrasting themes, and the intense dramatic power of this remarkable work were colored with that potent tone vividness which divides the piano into a score of instruments in Paderewski's hands. The two dances by Brahms were played with such fanciful intimacy that one forgot the damning stamp of "cold intellectuality" that many feverish critics have branded on his works. Several Chopin selections, two quaintly rigid Scarlattis, as many Rubinstains, and Paderewski's "Melodie" completed the fifth memorable concert.

Ere I turn a saddened pen upon the mournful farces that Mme. Tavery and Katie Putnam are responsible for, I would raise my voice in protest at the ungenerous manner in which the Paderewski management has received our golden tribute. They might have given us one concert at least, with the addition of an orchestra, so that we could have heard Paderewski's "Fantasie Polonaise," rumored to be a great piece of pianoforte literature—which is more than can be said of the little nocturnes and dances he has given us thus far.

If you have any tenderness or sympathy locked away within your breast, unpack it, go to the Columbia and weep little tears for the sweet trustfulness with which Katie Putnam brings The Old Lime Kiln to San Francisco. The little orphan boy selling papers a day late, the country maiden in the metropolis with her delinquent butter and eggs, an umbrella peddler in the summer time, are small subjects for pity compared with Miss Putnam and her jaded play. It is a melodrama; a Dazey; a loo-loo. The guilty man says, "Who can accuse me now?" The timely heroine answers, "I can!" "By God!" howls the juvenile villain. "By thunder!" shouts a muscular hero. When this rollicking humor is not in force the comedy element has the stage, supplying the deadly earnestness. On the tropical side of Market street such a play would make a blazing success; at the Columbia, where the audiences have not been educated up to the frolicsomeness of the leading gentleman being placed to roast in a lime kiln, while the fair-headed heroine batters her way through the roof of an outhouse to save him at the critical moment, it is doubtful if the full piquancy of the piece will be realized.

Miss Putnam uses a dialect that is a composite of Laura Burt, Ole Olsen, and Henry Irving. She looks and acts very much like the late Gracie Plaisted, revelling in facial contortion and tragic intonation. Her methods are dolefully old-fashioned, and her supporting company is the poorest that could be gathered.

The Tavery Company's final week at the Baldwin has not been characterized by either financial or artistic success. Lohengrin, on Tuesday night, was as ragged a performance as Tannhauser, given the Saturday previous. Stevens, who sang the tenor roles in both productions, was ridiculously inadequate. I remember him in The Bathing Girl, which ran two nights at the Baldwin last year, singing the part of a counter-jumping hero. "Only a piece of dotted Swiss!" he wailed. From that to Wagner! No wonder that laundresses play at infidelity, gripmen dabble in agnosticism, and Keene grapples with Hamlet.

At the California of nights Paderewski's Steinway has been moved into the wings, and Thomas Keene has enlightened the followers of the tragic muse. His Shylock, like his Hamlet, lacks the definite conviction that one must feel for a character that is so complex, yet so unequivocal, in the minds of theatre-goers. He does not touch on the lofty side of the Jew's racial pride, the pathetic resentment of the man derided and oppressed. It is a small, grasping Shylock, reminiscent of his Louis XI. Richelieu, like Keene's Richard and Louis, has been softened into a clean-cut, intelligent piece of acting.

On Tuesday night I saw enough of Der Freischutz at the Tivoli to convince me that Von Weber, sung by a modest company, under skilled stage direction, is a much more enjoyable repast than Wagner by higher-priced people, without ensemble, tenor, or stage tactics. Ida Valerga and Kate Marchi are not remarkable singers, but they know well the roles of Agatha and Annie, and rendered them in at least an acceptable manner. Rafael (the one real artist in the Tivoli company) did nobly with Caspar, an exacting part for a voice of so light a calibre as his. Pache was such an improvement on the Wagnerian Stevens that I forgave him swallowing so many tones that belonged to the audience. The orchestra and choruses were well in hand and the scenery and effects admirable, particularly in the great Brocken scene.

The spectacular version of Faust deserved a better patronage than that extended the Alcazar this week, but Faust, the drama, like a great many good things, has been due to death in San Francisco, and the introduction of a race track humorist between the acts does not add very materially to the impressiveness of the production.

At the Orpheum it is the same old story of an excellent programme and crowded houses nightly. The Pantzer Brothers' marvelous head-balancing act, and Carroll Johnson's bit of old-time minstrelsy are both as clever specialties as may be seen anywhere in the country.

The concert given on Monday evening at Metropolitan Hall, by the Saturday Morning Orchestra, was not the glittering success its promoters had anticipated. Even the assistance of the best musicians of the Philharmonic Society failed to cover the scattering attack and general lack of ensemble. The orchestra is but a memory of itself in the days of Rosewald's leadership.

Frederick Warde, accompanied, it is said, by the best company that he has ever brought to this Coast, comes to the Baldwin Monday for an engagement of two weeks, which will be devoted to classical, romantic, and Shakespearean plays. During the first week The Mountebank will be presented on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday nights, and at the Saturday matinee. The Lion's Mouth, Tuesday, and Thursday, and Virginia Saturday. Frederick Warde, besides being an excellent actor, is an indefatigable student in the interest of dramatic art, and it may be assured that his presentations this season will be accurate and artistic in every detail. Landers Stevens, a young San Franciscan who has received favorable recognition throughout the East, is a member of the company. A Milk White Flag, by Hoyt, follows the Warde engagement.

The next Carr-Beel pop. concert, which takes place next Saturday at Golden Gate Hall, promises to be an event of great interest to our musical world, as this will be the fiftieth concert given by these deservedly popular artists. It is now five years since the concerts known as the Saturday "pops" were established, and it is acknowledged by all that they have done much to educate the public and elevate the taste for fine music. Saint Saeus' septette, Dvorak's American quartette, a solo by Beel, and Schumann songs by Chas. J. Dyer comprise the excellent programme.

Wife For Wife, another melodrama by the indefatigable John A. Stevens, which might be effectively sub-titled Othello Up to Date, has thrilled the patrons of the Grand this week. Darrell Vinton played the leading part with the melodramatic ardor that has so endeared him to the lovers of sensational plays, and Essie Tittell made a handsome heroine. For next week Pulse of New York, a melodrama of metropolitan life and announced as "the most realistic play ever seen on any stage." In this piece Florence Thropp will play no less than six distinct characters.

Commencing Monday night the William T. Carleton Opera Company will inaugurate a season of opera at Grover's Alcazar. The opening week will be given to Sir Julian Benedict's romantic opera, Lily of Killarney. Despite the attraction the price of seats will be from seventy-five cents down.

At the "Chutes" next Saturday afternoon and evening, the Auspacher Band, of the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, will perform, and the management has presented the band with an entire set of new uniforms. There will be a grand display of fireworks in the evening.

Jolly Nellie McHenry, in The Bicycle Girl, a musical skit (written for her by Louis Harrison) with a strong up-to-date flavor, will take the stage at the California next week. Miss McHenry is said to have an excellent band of comedians with her this season.

Der Frieschutz has made such a success at the Tivoli that it will be continued another week. Theresa Condray, a promising young soprano, will alternate with Kate Marchi as Annie.

The Old Lime Kiln will run another week at the Columbia, garnished with several new songs and comedy effects.

Sousa, the only John Philip, is coming. His great band will give four concerts at the Mechanics' Pavilion February 27th, 28th, and 29th, and March 1st. Who can resist the swish and swing of his marches, and who is too poor to do him reverence at popular prices? The expenditure will be doubly repaid by the pleasure afforded.

Owing to Paderewski's concert on Friday afternoon the Rosewald memorial entertainment has been postponed to March 6th.

A COUGH SHOULD NOT BE NEGLECTED. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are a simple remedy and give immediate and sure relief.

THEODORE Wores is spending his winter in New York painting away diligently. His Japanese pictures—the last hatch—went with a satisfactory gusto, in Boston and Chicago, as well as in other cities. This year he expects to come Westward and seek his “Chrysanthemum Land” again. Many of his Japanese friends have been greatly elevated in station since Mr. Wores’ last sojourn, and especially his adopted father. It must be explained, that when the artist first went to Japan in the early ‘eighties,” he was adopted as a son by a Japanese Marquis in Tokio, in order that he might visit the interior freely, and live where he pleased. It was of the utmost advantage, and it enabled him to obtain a far deeper insight into Japanese art and culture than any foreign painter before him. The adoption conferred upon him, it seems, a certain distinguished rank,—a courtesy title of his foster-father’s. Now that the Marquis has been promoted for patriotic services in the Chinese war, his elevation to higher honors, similarly affects Theodore Wores. When George Bromley was made consul to Tsin-Tsin, China, ten years ago, Wores made a Bohemian Club cartoon for the “Bon Voyage Jinks” representing “Uncle George,” as the Celestial God of Thunder. It has been proposed by some of his many friends in the Club, in anticipation of his return here in March, en route à Japon, that a mate to the Bromley cartoon shall adorn a complimentary Jinks, representing Wores in his newly won semi-paternal decorations. The only trouble is, it is not quite certain whether he is a Knight of White, Red, or Yellow Chrysanthemum. Amadée Joulin, the artist is studiously consulting local Japanese heraldic experts on the subject.

The eldest daughter of one of our most prominent and wealthiest Roman Catholic families is about to return here after a several years’ sojourn in England. Her brother, who is a leader in everything at Burlingame, has always shared his sister’s predilection for the British aristocracy and has been the foremost entertainer of its scions who visit this coast. However, his elder sister resolved to visit England for a time, and the young gentleman made a most ingenuous arrangement for her social enjoyment there. In one of the wings of St. James’ Palace, London, a number of titled gentlewomen, who have been left by their husbands or relatives in an impecunious condition, are permitted by the Queen to pass their old age in comfort and ease befitting their rank. Each one has a quiet suite elegantly furnished. But in addition to their incomes, these old ladies have another resource. Frequently may be seen a personal in the London papers to the effect that a “lady of title and of preëminent social advantages will undertake the introduction and chaperonage of a lady who has not enjoyed the same opportunities in the best society.” It was such an “opportunity” as this that our San Francisco heiress took, and her letters home have been filled for a year past with “Lady This and Lord That.” All of which overawes Burlingame.

The death of W. W. Blow in Oakland has caused more regret than one can describe. Looking back nearly thirty years ago, when scores of young Confederate officers flocked to the coast—many of them still suffering from grievous wounds—there is a certain romance attached to the California aftermath.

“Duke” Gwin and Mrs. Gwin gave a grand reception at the Occidental Hotel for all the young Southern émigrés. But Oakland was the Confederate stamping-ground. The Coffees, the Heaths, the Walls—especially the Glascocks and old Colonel Jack Hays—formed an invincible Southern aristocracy. The war over, the Kirkhams, the Shepards, the Shafters, the Howards, and the Braytons forgot all political differences, and with the advent of as handsome a man as Major Blow, or Major Hart, or Commodore Leon Smith, or Captain Floyd, or “dear old” Harry Christmas, there was a sort of jubilee. The C. B. C. Club was organized; and the U. S. A. officers from Goat Island, which was then a military post, joined cordially in the frequent Germans which were given by the entire wealth and fashion of Oakland. Of all the beaux, Major Blow led the list, although Harry Christmas—who through despair over his wounds voluntarily departed life one morning—was as gallant a cavalier “as ever strode a horse or trod a madrigal.”

Once Blow gave a picnic at Woodward’s Gardens. This was in 1867. It was an elaborate affair, and the guests were almost all children, with Mrs. Colonel Coffee and others for chaperons. At the time he could ill afford it—but “once a gentleman, always a gentleman!” The day was made a red-letter mark in the prayer book of the children who remember it.

The first mosquito’s come to town,
His bill is sharp, his wings are brown,
He bites the dude as well as clown,
Ho, ho!

He lights upoo the belle’s soft cheek,
He nips the parson, smooth and sleek,
Who smothers words he dare not speak,
Ha, ha!

On sultry nights this horned fly
Will slip the guarding portal hy,
And bask upon the breast or eye,
So nice.

A moment after, gorged and lame,
That wicked fly will jump the game,
And totter in abodes of shame
And vice.

But in life’s odd and various plan,
He is the true cosmopolitan,
The velvet cheek, the rustic tan
He gobbles.

A most peculiar beast is he,
Of gluttony and minstrelsy,
When over face, or hand, or knee
He wobbles.

The Bal Masqué at the Hopkins’ Art Institute, Tuesday night, was not “all gold that glitters,” so the men say—and also (it is whispered) the women. The most successful affair of the sort was that of 1890, in the old Bohemian Club building, on Pine street, when Bohemia patronized society, rather than society the world of Art. Of course, there was a wild night, but the women were not afraid to mask, as they were this last Tuesday night—many of them, and, besides, they entered into the carnival spirit with a vim, of which there was a lack Tuesday last. But the models were in arrears. There are many who roam about the San Francisco studios, and who may be considered as a potent factor in the Association. They and their spirit were lacking—owing to the overwhelming and flashing gleam of high society. In the some-time-ago, no one knew who anyone else really was for hours and hours. Hilarity reigned supreme, and was filled with surprises. “Uncle” George Bromley disguised himself as a Venetian youth, and deceived the discernment of the fairest women. Three of them who had sworn, en masque, an immortality of attachment, at the fatal unmasking hour, vowed a mortal revenge.

Time and again fun has been poked at the Reverend Anna Shaw, so “The Looker-on” is more than delighted to find out, on the testimony of her co-workers, that she is the “most grasping person” ever known. Anna’s jaw, when it wags, sometimes realizes $50 for half an hour’s work, and, in the recent war of the female suffragists, all of them have fallen down under mutual accusations. Sarah-becooper and her lovely daughter Hattie are charged with attempting to rule, or ruin, and make trouble wherever they go; the Reverend Miss Shaw is accused of bleeding the suffragists of $1500, and even Miss Anthony appears to have wafted away considerable swag. The female suffrage hubbub has been thoroughly pricked as far as California is concerned, and the press will not be slow to comment on the greed and voraciousness of these things in female clothes who pose as apostles of righteousness and charity.

In the March number of one of the most prominent English magazines, James Walter Smith, the writer, gives a review of "Social Life Among the Americans in London, in which he refers very gracefully to three San Francisco belles—Lady Waterlow, Lady Hesketh, and Lady Wolsley. Notwithstanding his compliments to the American women in general, he is apt to be patronizing, and twice he becomes absurd in his assertions. For instance, he relates an instance, which he vouches for, where a young and fashionable New York woman rushed up to a famous English belle at a great reception, crying: "Heavens, woman! what a complexion you've got! What soap do you use?" A likely incident!

Again, Mr. Smith remarks "A curious desire in American women is to kiss the Queen's hand." He adds that "the preseeutee can't get it through her head that, not being a subject of Her Majesty's, she has no right to kiss the Royal hand, or, if she knows, she purposely forgets it when the great moment comes. A certain fair American last year who was chided for this osculatory act by the shocked American ambassadress, replied gayly: 'Well, I said I'd do it, and I did it!'"

While Mr. Smith speaks warmly of Lady Hesketh (whom he describes as being a subject of attention and a hostess of the Prince of Wales), and of Lady Wolsley, he devotes more elaborate remarks to Lady Waterlow, giving her pedigree, etc., and lauding her many philanthropical deeds in England in connection with her generous husband.

What would Maggie Hamilton have said sixteen years ago!

People who give swell dinners and their hill of fare to the press for the edification of the public, should either eschew French altogether in its compilation, or employ some one to get it up who understands the language. At a recent grand affair of the kind one is informed of the appearance of huitres sur la coquille, a rather strange condition, if at all, as coquille happens to be a shell of the snail pattern, in contra distinction to ecaille, the shell enclosing the oyster and tortoise. As a matter of fact, should the French, who rarely serve the oyster otherwise than on the shell as a hors d'oeuvre, wish to describe it, they would simply designate the locality from which it was procured, as, for instance, huitres de l'est or huitres Californiennes. In any event, if the shell must be specified, the idiom would be huitres a l'ecaille. The soupe tortue verte mentioned is wrong both grammatically and colloquially. It should properly be rendered soupe a la tortue verte. Even the term soupe is a provincialism, the word potage obtaining more usually, unless in the commoner varieties, such as soupe aux choux, a l'oignon, au lait, etc. Again the same card speaks of jeune saumon. Probably the writer meant to say truite saumonée. If not, saumon jeune would be at least correct grammatically. In the name of common sense, in an English-speaking community, can we not have our hill of fare written in plain English, which would, at least, be preferable to execrable French.

A prominent Hawaiian resident now at the Occidental Hotel,—and recently arrived—says, concerning the recent Amnesty to ex-Queen Liliuokalani, that the lady may shortly marry a prominent member of President Dole's Government. At first thought this may seem absurd, but there is no doubt that gossip has lingered about Honolulu lately, and that the efforts of a certain official influenced the executive clemency. The ex-Queen would not be a bad match, for she has lots of money—a great deal more than people give her credit for just now. For one need not heed the idle tales which are thrown to and from the Islands.

Robert Davis, the brother of "Sam," the Carson humorist, departs for the East Monday, as representative of the Morning Call in New York and Washington—an arduous task, because "a hird can't be in two places at the same time," as the Irish say. New York has never been popular with San Francisco's special correspondents, save in the case of Isaac Allen, who has held out cheerfully and nervously for five years. His secret lies in getting his copy in swiftly. His predecessor for the Examiner, Henry B. McDowell, was a magnificent rhetorician, and if a high society scandal in the East was on the carpet, he could discover it beautifully through his lofty relatives, and send it at his leisure. But with a newspaper it's "Love me little, love me quick!" so far as the telegraph is concerned, and an iron constitution is required to wait through the watches of the night till four o'clock every morning in order to satisfy the news maw of the Golden Gate. Ned Hamilton himself once declared it a cut-throat proposition when he tried it in 1888.

It is the essence of Bohemianism to seek cheap notoriety, and therefore no one need be surprised that Alex. Hawes and Joe Redding have purchased a pewter pot in London and forwarded it to headquarters, duly inscribed. A pewter pot is not worth a dollar, and London contains millions of them. But it appears that these Bohemians wandered into the "Cheshire Cheese," a frowzy, ill-smelling tavern on the same level with a dozen other Fleet street resorts, which live on the reputations of old boozers like Dr. Johnson and Oliver Goldsmith. The cobwebs on the ceiling and the rank senility of the surroundings are the stock in trade, and impress, of course, any American Anglo-maniacs. The "Cheshire Cheese" furnishes good rump steak and mediaeval memories, but is about as dirty as the old "Boomerang" saloon, which was in its glory here twenty-five years ago. Charley Josselyn has received the pewter mug, which, being duly inscribed at a cost of about four hits, will be solemnly presented to the club in the near future. The gift is about as valuable as the gross of green spectacles in which the verdant Moscs invested, as told in the Vicar of Wakefield.

It must be admitted by even the most captious critic that society is getting more realistic every season, and sham does not "obtain" to the large extent of former years. What if good breeding demands a polite evasion of truth on occasions!—the girl of the period disdains any humbuggery of that sort; she says just what she "feels like" (expressive phrase!) The Brownie, also, speaks his thoughts aloud, undeterred by restraint of any kind. Hence it is not a matter of wonder that the favors at the final cotillion of the Friday Fortnightly Club should so delightfully have illustrated the fitness of things. What more appropriate for the heaux than chewing gum, and for the girls than stuffed Brownies? Ad. Mizner is said to have suggested snap shots of the boys at supper in lieu of the latter, as conveying the same idea, but the suggestion was not acted on.

The one great complaint at Burlingame, so the women say, is that Prince Louis of Savoy's company has been monopolized entirely by the men, and Prince Poiatowski is extremely unpopular because he has not proved a more willing interpreter for the society huds. The men, in fact, carried off the scion of Royalty every day on some sporting trip or other, and at night there has always been some Italian Colony entertainment, or else a gay view of the town by gas-light. The banquet which is to be given on the "Christoforo Colombo," by the Italian officers to Messrs. Tohin, Simpkins, Wheeler, Clifton, Prince Poniatowski, Count Ceni and the others will be a sort of Venetian Carnival it is prophesied.

How exultant is the expression on the erstwhile haughty face of the Noh Hill matron? A prince for a brother-in-law and a Royal Highness for a guest, is enough to make most women happy; but in this case it has had the effect of an added superciliousness, which is amusing to the beholder. For the benefit of this particular dame it is suggested that she get "pointers" from his altesse, who can tell her that in really "high" society where princes abound, the tone is simplicity itself. Arrogance is left to the vulgar, and is a type of the basse classe.

Although the papers have stated that young Clarence Mackay will remain permanently to engage in business with his father, it is not by any means certain. In fact it is more than probable that he will join Mrs. Mackay in London very shortly,—preparatory to a visit to the Riviera, for the early spring. A private letter from New York to one of the Mackays' old friends here, adds that the Bonanza King has stood the terrible ordeal of his elder son's funeral bravely, and far better than was expected.

It has been announced at Burlingame that Talbot Clifton will purchase a good-sized sailing yacht for the coming season. His friends are all giving him pointers, but he has not as yet decided between the various craft. His intuition is to take his friends along the coast, to Del Monte, Santa Catalina, Coronado, San Diego, etc., on lounging cruises. There is also said to be a plan afoot among some of the Burlingame men to lease a large yacht in syndicate.

It seems to be pretty well conceded by those in the swim that a brilliant wedding will be a feature of the Easter-tide, unless the beautiful girl spoken of as the bride elect should decide on a quiet ceremony in the rural home. Society is hoping for an "event," however.

Gossips assign the conquest of an Infantry Captain to one of the most popular girls in society, whose sweet disposition has made her a general favorite. The younger sister, they say, has also won a manly heart for keeps.

Many people are saying that the Committee on Arrangements of the Mardi Gras Ball made a grievous mistake by wasting so much money on unnecessary decorations. The Art Institute building is beautiful enough in itself without the addition of any more finery. A few pretty pieces of bunting and some flowers and ferns might have been in place, but to fill each room with rugs, and portieres, and fancy work, was ludicrous in the extreme. As the festival was given for the benefit of the Institute, a little judgment should have been exercised in this respect. Then again, after all the kind words the press bestowed gratuitously upon the affair, it would only have been right for the Committee to have attended to the wants of the representative newspaper men there. Some of them looked awfully dry, poor things, yet wine could not even be touched except at four dollars a bottle, and sometimes it had to be paid for in advance!

It is rumored that during the Lenten season society will divert itself in various ways, and the person who will originate novel methods will be the hero of the hour. Already a halloo ascension is spoken of, but to the outsiders it would seem as though many in the swim were too much inflated to rise higher (in their own estimation), and the possible rapid descent causes the project to be received with some show of hesitancy.

Another epidemic of skin grafting has broken out in San Rafael, nearly as intense as that of last month, when a dozen young ladies sacrificed slices of cuticle for a friend. This time a beautiful helle of Ross Valley who attends the Episcopal Church, has yielded a strip of skin reaching from the thigh to the knee in order to restore one of her Sunday-school scholars to health.

A pretty hud is authority for a rumor that the re-appearance of Ed. Greenway upon the social tapis will be signalized by an ovation, and much curiosity is expressed as to what form the ovation will take. The Mardi Gras hall is not counted in this respect, the Easter-tide assembly of the Friday Night Cotillion Club being the occasion referred to.

The recent tea given by Lieutenant Joyes at the Presidio was so marked a success the girls are begging the officers there to keep them up during Lent, promising to attend regularly every week.

On dit, the bridesmaids for the June wedding are already being chosen, and 'tis also said it will be a rose wedding. The queen of flowers of every hue will be used to decorate and adorn.

An Englishman's Opinion.

Mr. Randolph Payne, a London wine merchant, whose comments on American wines and spirits abroad appeared in one of the daily papers some weeks ago, emphatically pronounced "Old Saratoga" Pure Rye Whiskey the favorite, and in many cases the only American whiskey in demand at the London clubs. Its delightful flavor and absolute purity have won it the warmest recognition among the critical connoisseurs of that big metropolis.—N. Y. Herald.

CORNER ELLIS and LEAVENWORTH STREETS

A FINE imitation of a San Francisco gale is blowing to-day, and if any one of your colony feels homesick he should simply go for a walk through some of the outlying streets, where wooden sidewalks still prevail, and where an occasional splinter might fling itself against his eyeballs, to cure himself entirely of his nostalgia. We have had a sickening surfeit lately of stories of shipwreck, and have not recovered from the horror of them, but this hurricane threatens many more disasters. The news which has just reached us of the tragic death of Cranston Potter has appalled New York society. He was a popular man, and the whole Potter connection is so thoroughly liked and respected in New York that the feeling of sympathy is very widespread. The Potters and Crosbys are said to be the two largest families known in New York. Several years ago I heard it estimated that there were, in one generation, seventy-six Potter cousins and seventy-two Crosby cousins—a very close race, you will see. The Potters are so prominent that there is scarcely a social function which does not include some of their number. It is additionally painful for them to hear news of such a sad and terrible event having occurred while they were conspicuous at balls, operas, receptions, and the like.

A letter from Washington tells us of the intense interest shown by women in the present political and financial situation. The time devoted to the five minute speeches seems especially affected by the ladies of the Capital, who crowd the galleries, and do not hesitate to express their approval or their disapproval very audibly. The same letter says: "I went to Mrs. Cleveland's card reception the other day, and, as some of my personal friends were receiving with her, I had the privilege of remaining for some time in the reception parlor, and could not but admire the strength and sweetness of the gracious hostess as she shook hands with one after the other of the seemingly endless line of guests." I suppose we may never hope for another Mrs. Cleveland in the White House. What an exceptional woman, who in so many years of public life has, apparently, made no enemy, and who has escaped the faintest breath of scandal. By the way, I might explain (as there may be uninitiated), that a "card" reception at the White House does not mean progressive euchre or whist, as one might fancy, but a reception to which cards have been issued. The term is used to distinguish it from a public reception. Rudolph Neumann and Louis Gerstle after ten days at the Shoreham in Washington, came over to the Waldorf last Saturday, the former leaving for San Francisco last night. As usual, they had not time enough to see their hosts of friends in both cities. A wedding of relative interest to San Franciscans was celebrated on Thursday in the Jesuit church of St. Francis Xavier, in Sixteenth street, when Miss Margaret Beales, a granddaughter of the late Eugene Kelly, was married to Theodore Sedgwick, whose brother married the elder Miss Beales about a year ago. A third daughter, Mary, will be married shortly to Mr. James Rich Steers. Mrs. Eugene Kelly, Jr. has given her house in Washington Square to-day for a musicale in the cause of charity. It is a notable event, as Madame Calvé will sing. This great artiste is to sing at another charity fête in a few days, the arrangements of which are somewhat unusual, as no tickets are sold. Each patroness pays fifteen dollars, which entitles her to four tickets, which she may distribute among her friends. As the patronesses include the most distinguished women of New York, the character and appearance of the audience may be readily imagined.

The two Astor receptions given, one last week and one last night in the beautiful new Astor houses, have been far and away the events of the winter. The house of Mrs. Astor and "Mrs. Jack" adjoin, and on both occasions were thrown into one. Old New York was thoroughly represented at Mrs. Astor's afternoon reception, while the young married set, sons and daughters of old New York, figured conspicuously at Mrs. Jack Astor's ball. There was a marked absence of extravagance at both receptions, which were in exquisite taste. The Astors never overdo things.

Everybody seems just a little dazed by the suddenness of the Lincoln holiday. It has scarcely been grasped as a fact yet, and here it is upon us. It will give the Lincoln cult a day for meditation, the Washington cult a day for comparison, the general populace a day for repose, and the sentimental a day for composition—for does not the feast of good St. Valentine follow hard upon? And nowadays, as in the old days, no one cares for anything but an original valentine.

I have heard several comments upon young Cucuel's drawing in your last number, and they are unqualified in their approval and admiration. This young artist will surely make you proud of him. His improvement is most marked; his clever letters have not been frequent in the NEWS LETTER of late, but all of us who have read them hope this is only a temporary interruption.

AN EXCELLENT INNOVATION.

GUESTS are always well looked after at the Palace Hotel. One of the latest improvements instituted by its management is the addition to the world-famous Grill—the first and most superior of its kind here—so as to accommodate the large number of people who dine there daily. The former billiard parlors and the old grill room have now been turned into one handsome apartment for the accommodation of these visitors, and it is safe to state that very few tables will ever be found vacant. By the use of the handsomest woods and rich decorations the interior is beyond description. The ceiling is thirty-five feet high, studded with incandescent electric lights, and the other lighting appliances are modern and elegant in every respect. The Ladies' Grill is a feature by itself, and the service everywhere is beyond comparison.

Many persons take a variety of remedies and try many novel procedures to reduce their weight. We do not refer to these. If you have been in fair health, with a normal amount of flesh, and yet have been losing weight of late, there is something wrong. If there is an inherited tendency to weak lungs; if your cold hangs on, or if you are weak, without appetite, losing color, and easily exhausted; this loss of flesh is the signal of distress. Heed it, promptly.

California Mines in Boston.

The Bostonese are much enthused over the prospects for a vast increase in the gold production of California, and investors there are taking very kindly to the shares of mines which are already, or which may be, listed on that market. In treating of this subject a circular now before us speaks of such properties as the Rawhide, App, Pioneer, Genesee, San Andreas, Merced, and Santa Isabella. The first three properties merit all that is said in regard to their merits, and the Merced may, in time, prove of sufficient value to warrant the quotation of its shares at present prices, away up in the millions. It does not yet, however, and there is no argument that will justify any such valuation. There are rich men behind it, that is all. If this mine, promising although it may be, jumps from $150,000 to six or seven millions on the reputation of its backers, what will a steady dividend payer like the Rawhide be worth if its shares are ultimately listed. That is another little question which may interest people contemplating an investment. Even the Pioneer Mine is selling dirt cheap in comparison. The statement that this property produced in December $9,592, at an expense of $4,325, leaving a net profit for the month of $5,266, is correct. The twenty-stamp mill has been completely re-equipped with new gold-saving appliances, as well as new belts for its eight concentrators, and these latter started up, so that the supply of sulphurets as a by-product will add materially to the gross output. The company had on January 1, $11,000 surplus on hand net, after paying all expenses.

The Necessity For Caution.

The App mine is developing at a rate which, if it continues, will make it a second Rawhide. Mention was made in these columns last week of a rich strike in the 400-level, the character of the ore interesting mining men of all classes, on account of the peculiar form in which the gold grows in the quartz. A strike like this in Jobaunesburg or West Australia would be re-echoed all over the world within reach of a press correspondent. But we are a modest set in California, and in the matter of mines invariably show a disposition to keep the light hidden under a bushel. The truth will, however, prevail in time, as it always does. Regarding the Genesee, San Andreas, and Santa Isabella mines, we must confess ignorance. The names are common enough in this State, and several districts can boast of an Isabella in several adjectival degrees of sanctity. For this reason, and the difficulty of locating certain properties, the district should be designated so as to afford a person an opportunity to learn what they are dealing in. A number of wild-cats will be shunted on East by persons who care for nothing outside of making money, and for this reason people should buy nothing without carefully scrutinizing not alone the prospects of the property, but the people connected with its management. The name alone of some people is enough to damn the best property that ever existed.

Thirty Millions In the Moon.

One of the propositions which now and then crops up in the mining world to make one rub his eyes to realize whether he is awake or dreaming, makes its bow to the public through the interior press. This scheme is the organization of a company with only thirty millions of capital to work what is described as the Hexter Mine, near Mokelumne Hill. This scheme, which is said to be "a very extensive one," a statement in which most people will coincide after they peruse the report and find that, for this thirty millions, the greatest depth so far acquired on the lode is but seventy-five feet, the quartz yielding the comparatively modest return of from $7 to $20 per ton. As a kind of an offset the statement is made that the lode passes under many of the most valuable gravel channels in Calaveras, which may strike some miners as rather a peculiar recommendation for a quartz mine, but opinionous from outsiders must bend meekly before the sanguine prediction that "not less than one hundred million dollars will be the product of these channels." In face of all these brilliant prophecies which will, doubtless, be accepted with due respect by mining men who have let this great bonanza pass unnoticed under their feet for twenty years, the report proceeds immediately to burst up the whole brilliant conception that "the Hexter is the Mulatus (sic) of Calaveras County," referring to the uncanny Mexican blow-out, which turned out the biggest fiasco ever known on the American continent. Not strange to say, when the predictions regarding that miserable Union Gold wildcat near San Andreas are remembered, which led to the beggary of hundreds of people in Great Britain, the name of C. A. Hamilton appears on the Board of Directors of the Hexter. This in itself is a recommendation which will, doubtless, carry due weight with investors, who, for further light, are respectfully referred to the recent history of the Union Gold and Mulatos deals of infamous memory. The Hexter is suggested as a fitting subject for the new Gold Exchange, upon which to make its first investigation, and we not only abide by its decision, but cheerfully advertise it for the benefit of the purses of people, which we believe are again boldly threatened.

English Opinion Of McLaughlin.

The following excerpt from the Mining Journal, the leading London authority on mines, etc., shows how correctly that portion of the daily press which undertook to impugn Major McLaughlin's standing abroad, gauges the opinion of English investors: "The San Francisco NEWS LETTER, in the recent number to hand by mail, speaks very eloquently on behalf of Major Frank McLaughlin, of the good work he has done in the management of mines on the Feather River, and very powerfully defends him from the uncalled for and most abusive attacks made upon him by a portion of the San Francisco press. With the whole of this eloquent defense we entirely agree, for his critics have quite overlooked the great and good work he has done on behalf of the mining industry of the State." The Journal then goes on to quote the article to which reference is made, for the benefit of shareholders in the companies which the Major represented, letting them see that at least a portion of the San Francisco press keeps in touch with the world, and is not altogether provincial in dealing with affairs of the day. The way the Hammond case has been treated in the same quarter is another unfair illustration of how little is really known here of men and manners outside of this comparatively limited field of journalism.

Fire Underwriters In Convention.

The twentieth annual meeting of the Fire Underwriters' Association of the Pacific was held during the week, followed by the usual banquet as a cheerful wind up to the proceedings. The report of the Secretary showed a decrease in the membership from 197 to 181, due to the demoralization in the insurance business, which has caused many underwriters to seek other employment. The financial condition of the Association was, however, shown to be in excellent condition. The Treasurer's report showed a balance of $679.65 in the treasury, with receipts for the year of $1,293.50, and a disbursement of $613.91. President Driffield reviewed the business of the year in his address, and suggested some amendments to the constitution. Several papers were read during the session. Among them were the following: "Forty-five Years Ago," by D. B. Wilson; "A Plea for Local Board Organization," by Lesley Bates; "Counter Business," by Alfred R. Grim. An able paper was read by A. W. Thornton, on "The Non-Cancellation Clause," followed by "The Suggestions of a Newspaper Man," offered by Henry D. Bigelow. J. H. Morrow advocated "Inspections," and papers were received from Edward Niles and Mr. Farnum on current topics; "Adjusters' Charges and Contributions Thereto," by C. Mason Kinne; "Mortgage Clause," by W. H. Lowden; "Reinsurance Clause," by George H. Tyson, and "Constitution and By-Laws," by R. W. Osborn were also highly appreciated by those present at the closing session of the Convention.

Business has been very dull in the Pine-street market, and prices show few changes of any importance. There are good reports coming along from Occidental, and Con. Cal.-Virginia is said to be looking better again. There are hopes of a turn for the better.

PERISH the clumsy duffer who lurks in dark angles for the prominent and coin-laden citizen, who, drunk with wine, reels home to his expectant and disgusted spouse. The ruffian lacks nerve. He is a low, underdone vagabond compared to the dashing socialist who invades the bank in broad daylight, pistol in hand, rifles the safe, after vaulting the servitors, and packs off the swag with a dramatic shriek of derision. By the immortal gods! what a contradiction clamors in the hearts of men. Nineteen out of twenty commentators on the "outrage" (and what a fine old serviceable word that is) protest that they hope the banditti will escape arrest. Certainly they did the job in good shape. The loot was small. They were entitled to a larger swag, for, when there is so much subterranean pilfering, we cannot help, in our weakness, patting the daring scoundrel on the back who will do a deed of appropriation in broad daylight. Of course, it would be highly improper to call these thieves gentlemen. But there be worse than them, my masters, wearing diamonds and broadcloth on the sounding thoroughfare.

BECAUSE the women of San Francisco have not let down their back hair and howled while Paderewski played, the critics sadly find that they have no souls. It is doubtful if the women of the East would have rent their garments and the firmament over Paderewski had he been a female. Here men are not so scarce that the ladies are happy at an opportunity to go crazy over one. The census really has a good deal to do with this sort of musical enthusiasm. In New England, now, where there are two women to one man, Paderewski had to keep to the large cities, which are efficiently policed.

THE spectacle of Dr. Brown, charged with adultery and lying, scurrying around with a notary and stenographer in search of affidavits to convict a woman of the heinous crime of asking a non-member of the church to vote against him at a prayer meeting, ought to impress the council. And what gives the spectacle greater dignity is the fact that Dr. Brown uses his wretched wife to build this poor back fire behind a dangerous witness. His Reverence of the First Congregational Church acts like a coyote.

HOW the cackle, cackle of society goes on. God's truth! but it makes the heart of a truthful man bleed to hearken of those inconsequential imbeciles. Now, by the Holy Fry Pan! they swear off flesh meat. Tarry there, butcher; cut not that tenderloin steak. Pause ye on the thresholds of the luscious porterhouse. Society has declared this year that Lent must be Lent, and will permit of no departure from the feast of humble herbs and good old fish.

JUDGE Morrow is to lecture before the Mechanics' Institute on the subject of "Six Years as a Statesman at Washington." It might be respectfully suggested to the Judge that it takes something more than six years at Washington to make a statesman. "Six Years in Congress" would sound better.

DOCTORS Ford and Field are said to have disagreed seriously over a scarlatina case the other day. This is a common occurrence, and of no immediate consequence to any one except the patient, who usually pays for it with his life. That is all the doctors want, anyway.

THE A. P. A. tapped an Artesian well of ink when they set Father Yorke flowing. The A. P. A. may have their good uses, but this town is being tormented to the danger point. Drenched to the skin by the Yorke out-pour, the bedraggled inhabitants are not likely to be discriminating in their fury. An A. P. A. castle is just as likely as a cathedral to go up in flames, while a maddened populace dances the earmagnole in the glare and shrieks for the blood of both Hudson and Yorke.

THE attention of Brother Bovard of Alameda is respectfully called to the fact that the Press Club used that punch bowl again on Thursday night. And there were ladies there, too. A chance like this to make a fool of himself ought not to be passed by Alameda's pocket Parkhurst. His guns have been silent lately. Can it be that some wealthy pew-holder not indifferent to sense has exercised the power of every wealthy pew-holder and spiked those tremendous engines of war?

THE verdict in the Shattuck case may have been right or wrong, about which we are not qualified to pronounce, because we did not hear or see the witnesses, but we know that a jury has been judicially pronounced a part of the court, and that for impugning its action in a letter, a citizen was adjudged guilty of contempt of court, and made to pay $500 fine. It is something new under the sun for the court itself to be the assailant of one of its own vitals.

ONE of the latest catch-penny dodges is that of the weary, down-trodden solicitor for an invention which will regulate the gas so that the company will never be able to declare a dividend. Probably the next idea will be to put in some kind of a machine which will allow every burner to run at full blast and then make an affidavit that no gas has been burnt at all.

DURRANT is busy writing a book. Probably the Book of Judgment put the idea in his head.

A Book of the Week. * There has been already more written about the War of the Rebellion than there has been about any other war in the world's history.

A short lifetime could be devoted to reading the "memoirs," and "reminiscences," and "recollections," and "histories" of the great struggle, and the historian of the future will find his chief difficulty in l'embarras des richesses which will confront him as he commences his labors. But among the many leading authorities on the war the memoirs of General Longstreet will not be the least interesting, for he is, perhaps, the last of the Confederate leaders who is able to write, and on him has fallen the task of giving to the world the history of the Army of Northern Virginia. We expected much from this book and we have not been disappointed, and, in many respects, these memoirs will take their place beside the works of Sherman and Grant. And the fact that General Longstreet was one of the first of the great Confederate Generals who accepted the results of the war with gallant resignation, gives to this book a special significance, as time has proved the wisdom of his advice and the far-sightedness of his views. It would be idle of us to attempt to follow these memoirs through the 700 odd pages they fill, or to attempt to criticize the history of "war's magnificent stern array" which they contain, but it cannot but be instructive to note the opinions of this famous Confederate on some of the vital issues of the great struggle. As a graduate of West Point, and a veteran of the Mexican war, General Longstreet was from the beginning a marked man, and we find him at Bull Run in the command of a Confederate brigade. That battle was, he thinks, lost to the blue because of McDowell's over-assurance, while he thinks Beauregard erred in not pushing on to Washington. Of McDowell, General Longstreet says he was "untoward, and not adapted to military organization or combination," while of General McClellan, who commanded at the next battle in which Longstreet was engaged—at Williamsburg—he says: "General McClellan's plans were laid according to strict rules of strategy, but he was not quick or forcible in handling his troops." Fair Oaks, or Seven Pines, was, he thinks, lost through the failure of General G. W. Smith, the Confederate, to grasp his opportunities. Criticisms of the leading Generals on both sides form one of the chief features of this book, and, whether right or wrong, these criticisms will be read with interest. Indeed, we can offer our readers no better epitome of this book than to attempt a condensation of what General Longstreet thought of the leading Generals of the war on both sides. Here, then, is how he sums up Lee and McClellan:

"As a commander, Lee was much of the Wellington 'up-and-at-'em' style. He found it hard, the enemy in sight, to withhold his blows. With McClellan it was more difficult to strike than to march for the enemy. Both were masters of the science, but not of the art, of war. Lee was successful in Virginia; McClellan in Maryland."

Of the much mooted responsibility for the Confederate disaster at Gettysburg, Longstreet produces evidence to show that Lee regarded himself as the person solely to blame for the loss of that battle, and his memoirs will go far to settle the controversy on this subject. After Gettysburg we are told that Lee wanted to resign, but Jefferson Davis would not listen to the proposal, and one reason was, Longstreet says, because Lee's resignation would have placed either Beauregard or Joseph E. Johnson in command, and Davis did not like the former, while he was jealous of the latter. As for Johnson, Longstreet calls him the foremost soldier of the South, and it is certain that the personal animosities of Davis had much to do with some of the ultimate military results of the war. But there is no prominent figure in the book against whom Longstreet appears to be so bitter as against General Fitzhugh Lee, whom he accuses of being the man who lost the Confederate cause by reason of his failure to carry out the movements expected of him. This is what we regard as the weakest point in the book. According to the reading of all experience we may deny that any one man "lost" the Confederate cause. That cause was doomed by virtue of the superior resources of the North and the blockade. But in the judgment of Longstreet there was one more chance of retrieving the fortunes of the war at Chickamauga, and when the Confederates failed to follow up their success in that battle and "disperse the Union army," that last chance was neglected. Of General Bragg, Longstreet does not think much, but for Grant's military genius he has admiration, and he ends the book by expressing the opinion that the war might have been avoided without dishonor, but only by the North accepting the advice of General Scott, and allowing her "wayward sisters to depart in peace." This is an advice the North was not prepared to accept, but coming, as it does, from one whose voice since the war has been for reconciliation, it furnishes food for the somewhat sad reflection that the South still mourns over the "Lost Cause."

*"From Manassas to Appomattox," General Longstreet's Memoirs.

"The Memoirs of an Artist," an autobiography of Charles Francois Gounod, will enable the world of letters to better understand and appreciate the author of Faust. There is a charming modesty about the work which is commendable, and the affection which Gounod breathes for his mother, and which runs through his "memoirs," is well calculated to endear the great composer all the more to the reading public. As a painter, a litterateur, and a writer of music, Gounod stands before us in these memoirs with his thoughts attuned in phrases as sweet as he wove in the harmony of his musical expressions; and one of the chief charms of the book lies in glimpses which Gounod gives of his own tender and noble soul. Rand, McNally & Co. are the publishers, and we wish the book success.

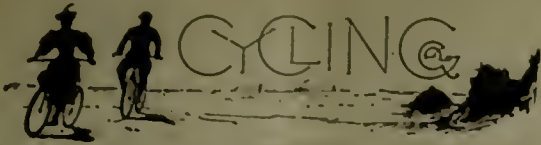

Rand, McNally & Co., of Chicago and New York, publish some excellent books, but, now and again, they also publish some trashy ones. Of the latter, "Sea Wolves," by Max Pemberton, is the latest, and one of the worst. It is a story of sea and land, wreckers and robbers, and it comes nearer to the "penny dreadful" than any thing we have read for some time. The author makes a robber mate of an ocean yacht say: "an' if you please, sir," to a brutal and ignorant skipper, and he mixes up the costumes of Sevilla, Valencia, Barcelona, Madrid, and Saragossa, in one picture on the coast of Spain! It is a story with a "plot" that might be agreeable to the palate of the Barbary Coast, and we can only recommend it to such of our readers as wish to throw their money away.

Some time ago a book was published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., of Chicago, called "More than Kin: A Book of Kindness." Now we see that one chapter from that book is being published in pamphlet form, and sold at one cent a copy. It is called "The Beauty of Kindness." Really, we cannot see anything worthy of special commendation, and notice, in this pamphlet that it is thus attempted to force it on the public. The whole thing might be epitomized in the words that "kindliness is the most powerful of all human agencies," a phrase we have often used before we ever heard of "More than Kin." But the pamphlet is wholesome reading, and that is as much as we can say in its favor.

"The Aeronautical Annual for 1896" is, like its predecessor, "devoted to the advancement of a neglected science." And, after reading what the different authors have to say about aviation, one cannot but come to the conclusion that the coming century will see man propelling himself through the air with buoyant safety. But it is as well to remember that this is more likely to be accomplished, not by "following nature," as we are so often advised, but by following science. We did not follow nature in the marine steam engine nor in the locomotive, for if we did we would be paddling across the ocean in web-footed ships, and running on land like a bare made of boiler plates.

The book sales for 1895 show a decided preference for solid literature. Caprice and fancy are slowly, but surely, giving way before the solid pressure of utility, learning, and other requirements of genuine bookmen.

Our own poet, Stedman, once said of Alfred Austin, the new Poet Laureate of England, that "the divine fire" of poetry was "lacking in Mr. Austin's respectable and somewhat labored books of verse."

IT BRINGS GOOD ROADS.—From various portions of the country comes the intelligence that systematic and earnest work is going on in the interest of road improvement, says American Cycling. The major portion of this work is traceable to the direct influence of the cycling element all over the country. This element has grown wonderfully during the past two or three years, and it bids fair to grow now faster and more solidly than ever. Every new recruit to the cycling fraternity means just one more convert to the cause of good roads, and it would be a curious thing, indeed, if the generally speaking intelligent and enlightened class of people who in the main take up cycling, cannot influence a still larger constituency of their friends and acquaintances among the people at large in the interest of so vital a matter as the securing of the good public highways so badly needed in this country. As the bicycle has gradually come to be recognized as a carriage, with all the rights of other kinds of vehicles as far as the use of the public highways is concerned, its ability for good in the way of arousing public sentiment in favor of good roads has increased until now every thinking man throughout the land admits that it is the prime factor in the movement for better public highways throughout the country and improved pavements in all our towns and cities. Therefore, it is not too much to say that the bicycle is a civilizing agent, as well as being a ministrant to health and pleasure, and its value cannot be measured by the pleasant sensations or the health benefit derived by the rider who uses it with discretion and common sense. The bicycle is bringing us good roads faster than any other agency in this whole broad land of ours.

The bicycle has been put to a strange use by the Sultan of Turkey. The other day the French Ambassador presented him with a dozen beautiful machines, remarking that the exercise they afforded might prove beneficial to the beauties of the harem. The Sultan smiled grimly but said nothing. Shortly afterwards, however, certain ladies of the court, who had committed trivial offenses, were forced to ride around the courtyard, heavily veiled, of course. Falling in the soft sand of the courtyard and performing various involuntary acrobatic feats of a ludicrous nature, they were sufficiently punished for their misdeeds without becoming seriously "damaged." The Sultan has evidently more brains than he is given credit for.

SAY what some soreheads please about the bicycle craze dying out, there is apparently no cause for lovers of the wheel to heed their dismal croakings. Royalty in England has taken to the wheel and that is saying a great deal. Besides that, all the dealers who some time ago contracted for a large number of wheels and could not dispose of them have now sold out entirely and have none left for the city trade. The people who called it a "craze" were the very ones to throw discredit upon the healthy exercise and it will be a good thing generally when they crawl back to their beds again.

The best way to remove rust, says The Wheel, is to first grease the machine well, let it stand for a day or two and then rub it briskly with a cloth moistened with ammonia. If this does not quite remove it, wash carefully with a weak solution of hydro-chloric acid, drying thoroughly with a cloth and polish with a soft leather, being very careful to remove all traces of acid from the metal.

THE Marquis of Queensbury is ready to back himself for $500 against any non-professional cyclist of his weight, which is a trifle over 160 pounds. How the good Marquis can race for money and still remain an amateur is hard to see.

THE less you screw and unscrew nuts and bolts, the better for your machine. Have it fixed right in the first place and then leave it alone until repairs are necessary.

"KAIRON GNOTHI."

The Secret in Making Money is in this Old Greek Proverb.—
It Means "Know Your Opportunity."—Some of the Men
Who Made Millions by Knowing How.—Very Valuable Information.

WHEN Commodore Vanderbilt was asked how he made his great fortune of $90,000,000, he replied: "It was an easy matter to become rich; just watch for the opportunity, and then take advantage of it," said he. "I commenced with only a few hundred dollars." But there are many people who cannot recognize the opportunity to make money. They may have a little sum to invest but are not in a position to know what is going on.

It is a well-known fact that Commodore Vanderbilt made most of his fortune by buying stocks at a low price, and holding on until they had an immense rise. He had the peculiar gift of knowing just when to buy and when to sell. Other men have made great fortunes in stocks of one kind or another, among them being John W. Mackay, the Rockefellers, and Jay Gould. They all started with small sums.

Among the stocks that have been sensational in their development is the Bell Telephone stock, rising from a very low price to over 200. This stock has paid large dividends and made the original investors rich.

Ten Millions a Year.

The Western Union Telegraph Company started business with $500,000 of capital stock. Its present capital stock is $100,000,000, and pay $5,000,000 a year net profits to the stockholders.

There are many other high-priced stocks that cost original buyers a very low price, and now pay large dividends on many millions of capital stock.

The Edison Electric is another notable example of wonderful development and profit. A broker who bought twenty shares of the original stock at 45, costing $900, sold half of it a year later, getting $30,000 for 10 shares.

The Pullman Palace Car Company's gross earnings have grown until they are over $10,000,000 a year and the stock has gone up from a low price to 180.

There are many chances for making investments, but there are none like the Railway and Dock Construction stock and many prominent men in banking, railroad and financial circles say this stock, which can be bought now at $10 per share, is sure to sell at 50 before long, and eventually have an immense rise like the Bell Telephone, the Edison Electric and Pullman Palace Car stocks.

The par value is $100 per share and the stock is full paid and non-assessable. The stockholders have no individual liability whatever.

Mr. Edward A. Willson, the well-known Vanderbilt stockbroker, says: "In our twenty years experience we have never handled a stock of such intrinsic merit or one which will pay such big profits. This stock gives the small investor an equal chance with the capitalist, as the small investor generally has to buy at par and be content with a dividend of 6 or 7 per cent. a year. Any one can invest in Railway and Dock Construction stock now at $10 per share (the par value is $100) and they can buy from one share upwards at the same price a capitalist buys a thousand shares. The stock is certain to have an immense rise when investors and speculators become aware of its great value as the earnings will pay four and a half per cent. on the par value of the shares, which equals 45 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at the low price of $10 per share.

Surely this is an opportunity which is met with but once in a life-time.

There will be lively times in this stock when it is listed on the Stock Exchange. We deal in numerous bonds that pay from 4 to 5 per cent. a year. We are so confident of the profits that will accompany investment in this stock that we have not the slightest hesitation advising our clients to sell their bonds and invest in Railway and Dock stock while they can buy it at 10. The company is in solid financial condition, has no indebtedness of any kind, and there are no bonds or mortgages ahead of the stock.

The company owns all the rights, titles, interests in, and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell indestructible piles under U. S. patents. The best engineering talent of the world has heretofore been unable to produce a pile that is absolutely indestructible. Many costly experiments have been tried to make wooden piles impervious against decay and the ravages of marine worms, but the wooden piles only last from six months to a few years, requiring continual replacement at great expense.

Certainty of Profit.

There is an enormous demand for indestructible piles in the construction of piers, jetties, docks, bulkheads, breakwaters, foundations for bridge piers, etc.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are, perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. 3000 miles are now being graded or are under contract; the great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s patent pile in solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Many negotiations now pending will create an immense demand for the stock and cause it to sell at a very high figure.

Prominent bankers say: "The public ought to buy this stock now before the price goes up, for, by securing some of the stock now at 10, they can share in the great profits of development and will more than quadruple their capital very soon as the above are only a few of the many sources of earnings that will cause Railway and Dock Construction stock to rise to a high price.

The very moderate estimate of earnings pays 45 per cent. dividend on stock costing only $10 per share without counting in any profits on contracts with the U. S. Government or New York City. When any of these contracts are closed the stock will sell above $100 a share very quickly.

There will be spent by the City of New York in reconstructing a small part of the city water front about $3,000,000 per year for many years to come. In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, Ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

Old Style—New Style.

In place of the old wooden docks covered by temporary sheds which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

New York City's revenue will be greatly enlarged by this vast increase of taxable property on these new piers.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance to the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $4,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston; they are simply loose rock dumped in the water, forming a pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet at the top above the water. Each jetty is about 4½ miles long. The Railway and Dock Construction Co. build indestructible jetties of same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

In addition to all these immense profits the plans of the R. & D. C. call for an expenditure of about $10,000,000 to deepen the channel at Sandy Hook. The U. S. Government can well afford to spend this sum to benefit the vast commercial interests of the port of New York.

Even Bear Speculators Buy.

Not only the bulls but even the very best judges of values, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, are buying this particular stock now—they are aware of its solid intrinsic merit and magnificent future and confidently predict that this one deal alone will put R. & D. C. stock up to $250 a share—and other large contracts will follow.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction must come into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

Powerful influences that will push this project in Congress will cause an active, booming speculation in the stock, an influential lobby and important railway, banking and political interests are in line for this purpose.

Investors can buy the stock at $10 per share, in lots to suit, from the financial agents of the Company, Messrs. Geo. W. Dunn & Co., Bankers, 2 Wall Street, New York. Non-residents can remit to them for the shares by check, draft, money order, registered letter, or by express, or have the stock certificate sent by express C. O. D.

The price will be advanced shortly.

The officials and large stockholders are well-known practical financiers and business men, whose names are at once a synonym for trustworthy, capable management and a guarantee that any stock in which they invest is safe, solid and very profitable. Among them are George W. Dunn, Esq., President of the company, head of the banking house of Geo. W. Dunn & Co., New York, and president, director and trustee of other corporations; he has been prominent in Wall Street for 25 years as a careful, level-headed financier; Hon. Thomas Murphy, ex-Senator, the famous Collector of the port of New York under President U. S. Grant; the eminent lawyer R. A. B. Dayton, Esq., Counsel of the company, 322 Broadway, New York; Eugene Harvey Esq., banker, Drexel Building, Philadelphia, Pa.; R. M. Stanhrough, Esq., capitalist, West Hurley, N. Y.; Geo. D. Hilyard, Esq., contractor, New York; W. A. Childs, Esq., of the Calumet and Hecla Copper Co., Calumet, Mich.; Edward A. Willson, Esq., broker, New York; Geo. B. Shellhorn, Esq., Receiver Montgomery, Tuscaloosa and Memphis Railway Co., Montgomery, Ala.; Y. Carryer, Esq., of the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company, Field, B. C., Canada; Howard Swineford, Esq., of Howard Swineford & Co., Richmond, Va.; W. M. Shipp, Esq., cashier of Deposit Bank, Midway, Ky.; Jacob Deyo, cashier Huguenot Bank, New Paltz, N. Y.; C. E. Harwood, Esq., cashier Rockville National Bank, Rockville, Conn., and other prominent gentlemen.

The Railway and Dock Construction Company has an absolute monopoly and its earnings will increase with the steady growth of commerce and of railroads.

The secret of making money is in the old Greek proverb "KAIRON GNOTHI" (KNOW YOUR OPPORTUNITY).—The New York Mercury.

A WILFUL ERROR.

THE Examiner, wittingly or unwittingly, took occasion in its usual unreliahle manner to hold up to odium Mr. S. J. Duckworth, of Monterey, Chief Clerk of the Assembly at the last session of the Legislature. On January 30th of last year, a resolution protesting against the passage of the Reilly Funding Bill, was adopted by both Houses and ordered immediately sent to the Governor for transmission by telegraph to Washington. The Examiner states that Mr. Duckworth suppressed this resolution, for his own private ends. This statement Mr. Duckworth says is untrue. As a matter of fact the instructions of the House were carried out immediately after they were given, in proof of which Mr. Duckworth has in his possession a letter signed by C. M. Belshaw, the author of the document in question, stating that he accompanied Mr. Duckworth to the Governor's office and saw him personally hand it over to E. L. Colnon, the Executive Secretary to the Governor. Further proof that the instructions of the House were complied with is to be found in the fact that a voucher is on file in the State Comptroller's office for payment of the tolls of the Western Union Telegraph Company for sending the resolution East.

Mr. Colnon was interviewed a few days ago and corroborated the above facts. The Examiner, at this late day, partially retracts its accusations by printing the letter from Mr. Belshaw which removes all possible doubt attached to Mr. Duckworth's conduct in the matter.

DEAR EDITH: I suppose we shall have to put away our winter gowns pretty soon for summer ones. Have you ever heard of such weather? How the Easterners must envy us!

You know those delightful, spangled trimmings which have been all the rage this winter, don't you? Well, I understand that they will be stylish all this coming summer. Ethel wrote me from New York last week, saying that in the first consignment of spring goods she saw something that made her dear heart just green with envy. It was a lovely belt made of solid rows of glittering spangles, gilt steel or silver or something, worked on to an elastic band and fastened with a pretty buckle. It is meant for the demi-toilette. Talking about belts reminds me that so few girls select them of proportionate width. A belt of an inch to an inch and a half in width, and even that of five to seven inches, gives you a nice slender appearance; but the average belt, say of three inches, always makes you look thick-set and uncomfortable. A pretty belt on a pretty girl is awfully catchy, but great taste must be used in the selection of it. Have you noticed how fashionable purple is becoming in color? I don't mean the cheap colors, but the rich dark hues. For evening gowns it is just delicious. And so alluring to the male mind! Here is an idea of a gown I saw last night: It had a skirt of this same deep, warm purple cloth, with an Eton jacket of moire as-trachan with revers of chinchilla. The skirt was a big affair, with a pink silk lining, and the Eton jacket fitted beautifully over the woman's superb figure. Those pretty little tail effects to the coats are to be in vogue this spring. They give such a fine finish to the little Eton jackets. Sleeves still continue very large.

I must tell you that although sleeves are still wide, there is a possibility of their becoming smaller about spring. There is also some talk of a return to sloping shoulders. This will be all right for those of us who have well rounded arms and a good figure, but the milliner will have to help a good many out. The wide lace collarette now used, brings us back to where we were two years ago. A beautiful effect is produced by square epaulettes of fine ecru lace over a bodice of dark green velvet, or the purple I told you about, which opens in front over an ecru silk vest, with a yoke outlined with lace. The wide collars in vogue are sometimes cut deep into separate tabs of embroidery—covered light cloth, falling over the darker material of the gown. Have you had your traveling dress made yet for your Southern trip? If not, it should be made of some light weight material and cut, with a skirt and jacket to be worn with silk and thin waists, both light and dark ones being included in the preparations. Fancy knotted tweeds make stylish suits, if you prefer them. Red and olive green is a new combination, the vest and stock being of red velvet. Those silk and wool fabrics are just the thing for early traveling suits. A pretty blue cheviot is always appropriate, too. Mother is wearing a pretty dress of striped satin and moire, which is very becoming. The bodice is made with a deep basque, liberally trimmed with lace. It is very pretty on her, and the style will be copied. Over in Paris black cloth suits lined with crimson, purple, or cherry silk, are in vogue. The effect is rather heavy, but they could be worn here on our sharp mornings and cool evenings. When on the street they even wear fur vests, with collars and muffs to match. Persian velvet is recommended for afternoon wear. Some of the vests are even embroidered with sequins. Just think of it! There are some really good night gowns to be had at reasonable figures, nowadays. They range from $1 to $4 apiece. For the latter price fine cambric gowns can be had with yokes of dainty embroidered insertions, or with turned back revers collars, trimmed with wide ruffles of French embroidery. Sleeves are very wide at the top, and are fitted in at the wrist. Skirt chemises are larger than the ordinary designs, and are shown with tucked and ruffled skirts.

Good muslin chemises can be had from sixty cents up to one dollar.

You should try the Tom Thumb Valenciennes edging. It gives a pretty finish to a deep frill of cambric, and if whipped on by hand can be easily removed when worn out.

I hear that a new scent is soon to be placed on the market by Mr. Sainsbury of London. It is to be a combination of rose and violet, which is of very rare delicacy, and bids fair to be very popular during the coming season. The old favorites still hold their own, though. Lavender water is as popular to-day as it was eighty years ago. Violet water is delicate and will always have its admirers. Amy still stands by attar of roses. But then she is so dainty. Six years ago when in New York she bought about five drops of a big chemist, and it has lasted her ever since. She keeps it in a small phial, and every few months adds one or two drops of alcohol to it. The delicate odor accompanies her everywhere.

BELINDA.

There is nothing so refreshing as a good bath. The Lurline has a national reputation already. Beside other kinds there is also the famous Russian bath, including the "Needle" shower bath. The charges are very moderate, and everything is well conducted. Fresh sea water is pumped into the tank every night.

Fine birds wear fine feathers, and gentlemen do the same with underwear. John W. Carmany, 25 Kearny street, is the prince of furnisners. Ladies' goods also on hand.

SWEETHEART, GOOD-BYE!—PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE.

SWEETHEART, good-bye! Our varied day
Is closing into twilight gray.
And up from bare, bleak wastes of sea
The north-wind rises mournfully:
A solemn prescience, strangely drear,
Doth haunt the shuddering twilight air:
It fills the earth, it chills the sky—
Sweetheart, good-bye!

Sweetheart, good-bye! Our joys are past,
And night with silence comes at last;
All things must end, yea,—even love—
Nor know we, if re-born above,
The heart-blooms of our earthly prime Shall flower beyond these bounds of time.
"Ah! death alone is sure!" we cry—
Sweetheart, good-bye!

Sweetheart, good-bye! Through mists and tears
Pass the pale phantoms of our years,
Once bright with spring, or subtly strong
When summer's noon-tide thrilled with song:
Now woe, wild-eyed, forlornly bowed,
Each rayless as an autumn cloud
Fading on dull September's sky—
Sweetheart, good-bye!

IN MARSHLAND CHURCHYARD.—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Here where the dead men dream of life
Under the grass and clover,
Whitebirds come from the seastorm's strife,
Circling the marshland over.

Faintly ever, though winds blow free,
Echoes the surge's thunder,
Here where the dead men, home from sea,
Hark with a drowsy wonder.

Tired of tempest and raging wind,
Tired of spouting breaker,
Here they come, at the end, to find
Rest in the silent acre.

Shore seems better when seas run high,
Moaning in weary fashion;
Sea seems better when life's awry,
Swept by the storms of passion.

Feet pass over the churchyard turf,
Up from the sea or downward,
One way leads to the raging surf,
One to the perils toward.

"Hearken, hearken!" the dead men call,
"Whose is the step that passes?
Knows he not we are safe from all
Under the nodding grasses?"

LIGHT.—F. W. BOURDILLON.

The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one;
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the dying sun.

The mind has a thousand eyes,
And the heart but one;
Yet the light of a whole life dies
When love is done.

MID-RAPTURE.—DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI.

Thou lovely and beloved, thou my love;
Whose kiss seems still the first; whose summoning eyes,
Even now, as for our love-world's new sunrise,
Shed very dawn; whose voice, attuned above
All modulation of the deep-bowered dove,
Is like a hand laid softly on the soul;
Whose hand is like a sweet voice to control
Those worn, tired brows it hath the keeping of:—
What word can answer to thy word,—what gaze
To thine, which now absorbs within its sphere
My worshiping face, till I am mirrored there
Light-circled in a heaven of deep-drawn rays?
What clasp, what kiss my inmost heart can prove,
O lovely and beloved, O my love?

[STOLEN FROM THIEVES.]

Police Inspector—It was very plucky of you, ma'am, to have set upon the hurglar and so ably captured him; but need you have injured him to the extent of necessitating his removal to the hospital? LADY—How did I know it was a burglar? I'd been waiting up for three hours for my husband.

Firestone—How much vos dot one? SHOPMAN—Well, I can't recommend that one, Mr. Firestone. It is a very old lamp, out of repair, and I would be afraid it would explode and burn your store down. FIRESTONE—Wrap it up! Wrap it up!

"I want to buy a make-up box," said the young married man. "A make-up box?" the confectioner echoed. "We don't keep theatrical supplies." "I mean a box of candy to take home to my wife. I promised to be home three hours ago."

"Business," mused Charon, "is all-fired dull. I don't imagine science will ever again discover anything with the snap and go in it that appendicitis had." He sighed heavily as he ported his helm.

"Oh, yes," continued the girl of the prehistoric period "we had birds twenty feet high in those days." "Dear me," exclaimed the fin de siecle person, "what lovely hats you must have had. Well, well."

Bobbie—Father will be down in a moment. Have a cigar? VON BLUMER—Are you sure these are the kind he gives to his friends? BOBBIE—Yes, sir. They are some that mother gave him.

"They wouldn't hang a man for watering his whiskey in your State nowadays, would they, colonel?" "N-no, sah; I think not, sah. They wouldn't do no mo' than try him fo' heresy, sah."

Mrs. Ferry—Did you never learn any trade? PERRY PATETIC—Yes'in. I'm what might he called a practical geologist, though I don't work at it only when I git sent to the rock-pile.

Jagwell—What makes that hen in your back yard cackle so loud? WIGWAG—Oh, they've just laid a cornerstone across the street and she's trying to make the neighbors think she did it.

Mrs. Willowsnap (calling on Mrs. Wangle)—Your mother has a lot of new furniture, hasn't she, Willie? WILLIE—Yes'm, and the man comes here every week to collect the bill.

Customer—I notice some shoes in the window that you have labeled "Temperance shoes." What kind are they? DEALER—They are warranted not to be tight.

Miss Gush—Oh, captain, were you ever hoarded by a pirate? CAPTAIN STORMS—Yes. He charged me $11 a day for a hall room on the fourth floor.

Sunday school teacher—And the prophet rent his clothes. Johnny, what does that mean? JOHNNY—I s'pose he didn't have the price to buy 'em.

"Now that you've heard the poem tell me what you think? Oughtn't I to get $10 for it?" "Y-e-e-e-s. Ten dollars or thirty days."

Skinner—Is Mr. Laylow one of your permanent boarders? THE LANDLADY—He is. I told him he couldn't leave until he had paid up.

Passenger—Man overboard! Man overboard! MATE (carelessly)—It's only a deck-hand; had more'n we wanted, anyway.

She (sentimentally)—What poetry there is in a fire! HE (sadly)—Yes; a great deal of my poetry has gone there.

Mrs. Scraply (during the fight)—Now have I made my self plain? MR. SCRAPLY—No, you were horn that way.

OCCASIONALLY one sees on London streets the brother of a man who played a great part in English politics—the brother of the famous Lord Beaconsfield. He is an insignificant-looking old man, bearing no resemblance to Dizzy whatever, either in looks or in point of intellect. For many years he acted in the capacity of clerk in the House of Lords, and was present when his brother walked into the House bearing the Sword of State before Queen Victoria, who came to open Parliament in person out of respect to her Premier. The old man is still hale and hearty.

—Of the kindness and sympathy of Lord Leighton, already many stories are being told. The following as related in the London Court Journal, is very characteristic of the dead President. A young artist, without friends or money, went to London to make—as he thought—his fortune. But he soon found that it was no easy thing to make a start among the struggling hundreds. At length he wrote to the President of the Academy, and stated his case, forwarding at the same time some specimens of his work. Within a few days he received an answer, asking him to call at Sir Frederic's house. He did so with much nervousness, but his host soon set him at ease, gave him encouragement and two letters of introduction. Above all things he advised him to study. As the young man was leaving Sir Frederic handed him an envelope, observing, "Here is an example of the best kind of drawing. No doubt one of these days you'll be able to do as well, if not better." It contained a cheque for $250.

—The late Lord Leighton, better known as Sir Frederick Leighton, was born in Scarborough, Eng., in 1830. His successful career began in 1858, and in 1869 he was elected to full membership in the Royal Academy. Thackeray, writing to Millais from Rome, as early as 1854, spoke highly of him, and prophesied a great career for him.

—When Paganini died, the belief was common that the Devil would take his soul, to whom it was supposed to have been sold. The body was therefore left for five years on the rocks of San Fereol, when it was taken care of and interred by the Duchess of Parma. The coffin was lately exhumed, and the face was found to be perfectly preserved. Baron Achille, a son of the dead man, has had the body placed in a modern coffin with a glass plate to it, so that it need never be re-opened.

—Judge Farthing, of Indiana, has a coffin made from a walnut tree he planted in front of his house forty years ago. A short time ago, feeling very feeble, he ordered the tree cut down and sawed into boards. From these was made the narrow home wherein he expects to await the sound of the great trumpet.

—Alfred Austin once criticised Lord Alfred Tennyson, holding that he was not even at the head of the poets of the third rank, and that posterity would agree with that opinion. Tennyson merely replied with the following couplet:

"Tennyson is no giant; all men know it,
For so says Alfred Austin, dwarf and poet."

—Anthony Hope Hawkins, author of the Zenda stories, is slightly bald, and has dreamy, thoughtful eyes. His manner is half-kindly, half-cynical, and somewhat blasé. He is now thirty-four years old and is unmarried.

—Speaker Reed usually sits up until two o'clock in the morning, working at his speeches and magazine articles. Everything is written in his own hand, excepting letters, and Mrs. Reed revises all his important work.

—Paderewski asserts that Liszt and Rubenstein will never be surpassed or equaled, and that in the history of pianoforte playing they will be known as the two greatest geniuses.

—The Empress of Russia has in her possession an ermine mantle valued at $50,000. It was given to her by her subjects living in the province of Kherson.

MOTHEBE, be sure and use "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for your children while teething.

A CURE FOR A COLD.—A writer in the Medical Record recommends the use of bicarbonate of soda in the treatment of that most annoying of all nuisances, a cold. The remedy recommended, which should be administered in the early stages, consists of twenty to thirty grains of bicarbonate, given in two or three ounces of water, every half-hour, for three doses, and a fourth dose at the expiration of an hour from the last one. Two to four hours are then allowed to elapse, to see the effect, and the four doses are repeated if there seems to be necessity, as is frequently the case. The writer claims that the same treatment may be used for "la grippe" although the results are not always so sure. In such cases he combines phenacetin, five to ten grains, with ten to twenty of soda, and gives the powders, with hot water, every two hours continuously for a day or two.

THEFT IN CHINA.—When a theft is committed upon the streets in China, the shopkeeper in front of whose store the robbery occurred is held responsible, pending the capture of the culprit. Should he not be found the merchants along the street may be compelled to make good the loss. This makes a detective of every Chinaman, and lawbreakers are always brought to justice.

ASBESTOS WOOL FOR SHOES.—A preparation consisting of thin sheets of compressed asbestos wool is now used in the manufacture of boots and shoes. Being a non-conductor of heat, it counteracts the influences of heat, cold or moisture and, being a non-conductor of electricity, the person wearing such boots is enabled to walk safely over live electric wires.

CREMATION versus BURIAL.—There are at present twenty-six cremation societies in this country with about eight thousand enrolled members. The number of incinerations has thus far been over thirty-five hundred. The movement is rapidly gaining favor all over the world.

A STRANGE INDUSTRY.—The proprietors of the skunk farm at Chesterton gave up their scheme in despair. The surrounding country was depopulated and finally the animals devoured their young. The hides of these animals are quite valuable.

AN OLD LAWSUIT.—A lawsuit, commenced in 1595, is at present in the courts of Bavaria. The parties to it are the Lords of Thungen and the market community of Burginn. It is expected that this year will close the suit.

WEATHER FORECASTS ON LETTERS.—It is proposed to stamp letters arriving at the Baltimore Post Office with a forecast of the weather for the following twenty-four hours. The plan, if adopted, may become general.

COLOR PHOTOGRAPHY.—Dr. Selle, a Brandenburg physician, has discovered a process by which colors can be successfully photographed. The process is still a secret and has taken five years to perfect.

A NOVEL LAUNDRY.—Chicago boasts of the only laundry on wheels. The proprietor and his wife drive about in their van and laundry plain clothes and towels while you wait. The scheme is quite successful.

THE LARGEST FIRE ENGINES.—Two of the largest fire engines in the world were recently completed in London. One throws 1400 and the other nearly 2000 gallons of water per minute.

NATURAL BEAUTY.—Cold water and pure soap are the best things for the face. Nearly all complexion beautifiers are injurious to the skin.

HEAT FOR THE VATICAN.—The Vatican is to be heated by hot air. There are eleven thousand rooms in the building, many of which never get a ray of sunshine.

PINE CONES FOR KINDLING.—Pine cones are valuable kindling for an open fire. Being full of turpentine, the blaze is fragrant and cheerful.

The art of Japan has made her famous. George T. Marsh, 625 Market St., has collected the finest specimens obtainable.

Commissioners Fitzgerald states that the bread of life is often manufactured in the dens of death.

English papers have been partially prohibited in Turkey. What would the Sultan think could he see some of ours?

It is said that the Turkish soldiers surrounding Zeitoun are starving. There may be such a thing as Providence after all.

It is not likely that ex-President Harrison will ever run for politics again. Matrimonial troubles are enough for a man in this life, anyway.

A morning paper states that "local Republicans are at work." Either 'his is a mistake or the gentlemen are very young Republicans.

The only perfect woman in existence at present is in the Louvre, at Paris. She is deaf, dumb, and blind, and men call her the Venus de Milo.

The doctor is said to be an unknown quantity in many villages in Hungary, which probably accounts for the universal health prevalent there.

Amelie Rives-Chandler has married a Prince. Fortunately for her he is a Russian, and is probably unable to understand her published novels.

Since the opening of the religious controversy in the daily papers, it is possible that even the Almighty does not know upon which foot he stands.

Mrs. Lease has decided to enter the Christian ministry, and forsake the platform for the pulpit. The former was probably not exciting enough to suit her tastes.

One of the Lord's shepherds was anointed with tar and feathers in Nebraska the other day. We have the necessary ingredients but lack the courage to apply them.

Now that the North Pole is said to have been discovered, it is suggested that all dissatisfied women emigrate thither and found a little republic to suit themselves.

A Southern Pacific engineer has been arrested in San Jose for wife beating. There are many persons who will lay the blame for his actions upon Mr. Huntington's shoulders.

Whether the word "obey" he used in the marriage service or not, makes little difference to the average woman. She will have her way in this life at all costs; and the millennium has probably been postponed to enable the Almighty to store up sufficient energy to hold his own against her in the hereafter.

Von Hartmann, the German philosopher and pessimist, proposes a tax on hachelors to support the numberless old maids in the Fatherland. Seeing that many of these gentlemen went through the Franco-German war, it is possible that some of them will even prefer wedlock to being robbed of their hard-earned dollars.

Don't let these worthless prizes deceive you. They don't amount to anything.

Consider their value if you bought them in the regular way, and compare this with the value of ruined linens, paints, etc., that you risk with these washing-powders. There's nothing cheaper to wash with than Pearline. That gives you easy washing that is absolutely safe. You would better use Pearline, and buy your own prizes. You'd save money.

THE ante-Lenten season came to a close in a blaze of glory with the Mardi Gras ball given on Tuesday evening by the members of the Art Institute, at their handsome Temple on Nob Hill. The committees labored hard, and succeeded almost beyond their hopes in making it a success, as well as a fitting climax to the gayest winter San Francisco has had for many a year. The decorations were beautiful in the extreme, and, in the main, novel in character; the attendance was large, quite a number of men, as well as many ladies, appearing in handsome fancy costumes, while the gowns of the ladies, who simply wore evening attire, were remarkable for their elegance. The uniforms of the army and navy, as well as of our foreign visitors, added brilliancy to a scene which will long be remembered by those who were lucky enough to behold it; the supper was excellent, and dancing was prolonged until a very late hour. The dresses were all very elegant and appropriate. Miss Catherwood, as Maguerite, was attired in a pretty maiden-like costume, and attracted much attention. Mrs. J. H. Jewett was resplendent in an Andalusian costume of rich changeable silk, trimmed with real lace, with a basking very short on the hips and finished with pink ruffles. The skirt was beautifully embroidered with stars of jet and gold, and the mantilla used was also of real lace. Her necklace consisted of three rows of lovely gold beads.

The five closing days and nights of the season, in which alone such things are supposedly permissible among church people, have been more than well-filled with feasting and revelry of many varieties. On Friday were Colonel Fred Crocker's dinner to Mrs. Easton, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckel's violet luncheon party, Mrs. Darling's novel Valentine luncheon, which she gave at her town residence on Gough street, at which Mrs. Niebaum was guest of honor. Horace Platt's dinner at the Bohemian Club, to which his guests were asked to meet Mr. and Mrs. Kruttschnitt; Miss Edith McBeau's luncheon at the Hotel Richelieu; Mrs. de Grey's luncheon at the University Club; Lieutenant Joyes' tea at the Presidio; Miss Anna Buckbee's dance; Mme. Ziska's reception in honor of the officers of the Italian man-of-war; Mrs. George Power's dancing party, and the Leap Year Cotillion of the Friday Fortnightly Club, which was led by Miss Hobart.

Saturday's festivities included the euchre parties of Miss Blanche Baldwin and of Miss McFarland, given at their respective homes; the tea at the Mercantile Library; Mrs. John M. Cunningham's delightful musicale; the theatre parties of Miss Catherwood at the Tivoli for the Misses Bee and Ethel Hooper, and supper afterwards at home; and of Miss Rose Hooper, who entertained forty of her friends, also at the Tivoli, followed by supper at the Occidental.

On Sunday Miss Jennie Catherwood gave the last of her Sunday teas; Mrs. Ignatz Steinhart gave a dinner complimentary to Miss Stella Greenebaum and Alfred Simon, at which eighteen guests were seated at the handsomely adorned table.

The University Club has been very popular with the ladies this season whereat to give luncheon parties, and not a week has passed for a month or more that they have not been of almost daily occurrence. There were two given there on last Monday, and both of them were remarkably pretty. Miss Helen Boss, who entertained seventeen of her young lady friends, chose violets and daffodils for the floral adornments of the tables; Miss Farquharson's was a red luncheon; the adornments hyacinths, smilax, and red ribbons, and red shades over the lights cast a roseate hue upon the scene. Her guests, who numbered fifteen, were an equal number of maids and young matrons. Besides these luncheons at the University Club, Miss Agnes Brandeustein gave a luncheon at her home on California street; the Misses Graham gave a tea at the Presidio, where there was a hop in the evening; the Saturday Morning Orchestra gave a concert at Metropolitan Hall; the Golden Gate Commandery reception and dance at Golden Gate Hall was a handsome and enjoyable affair; Mrs. Schwabacher's theatre party at the Columbia, followed by supper at her residence, was in honor of the bride-elect, Miss Jennie Schwabacher. Two handsome stag dinners were given on Monday evening also; at one Mr. Sam Shortridge played the host in the Tapestry room of the Palace, his chief guest being that prince of pianists, Paderewski. At the other General Forsythe presided, his dinner taking place in the red room of the Bohemian Club, and Prince Luigi and Captain Bertolini, of the Christoforo Colombo, were his guests of honor.

Among Tuesday's events were Mrs. Van Vliet's luncheon, to which her guests were invited to meet the bride-elect, her sister, Miss Fanny Crocker; and Mr. James Phelan's dinner in the red room of the Bohemian Club, from which he and his twenty-three guests proceeded to the Mardi Gras ball at the Art Institute.

Among recent events not named above, are the dinners given by Mrs. Henry Crocker, Mrs. Henry Scott, and Mrs. William Haas; Mrs. Robert Oxnard's luncheon, Mrs. E. J. Coleman's progressive euchre party in honor of Mrs. Kruttschnitt, and Miss Emma Butler's and Mrs. Ryer's luncheon parties, both at the University Club.

The first event in the Lenten season was the entertainment at Mrs. Clark Crocker's on Thursday evening, in aid of the Doctor's Daughters' Charities, and consisted of tableaux, the participants being young society belles and beaux. Mrs. Brandenstein also gave a dinner d'adieu to Mrs. Wm. Haas, and Mrs. Sig. Greenebaum the first of a series of dinners at which she purposes entertaining her friends during the next few weeks.

Tuesday next will be the wedding day of Miss Clara Huntington and E. Burke Holladay, and the ceremony will take place at the residence of the bride's uncle, C. P. Huntington, in New York city.

On Saturday next, at noon, Miss Laura Rountree and Dr. Charles McQuesten will be married at the home of the bride in Alameda.

On Saturday evening, the 29th, the members of the San Francisco Verein Club will hold a high jinks for members only.

British Consul-General Warburton and Miss Warburton have selected San Rafael as their place of residence, and will remove there early in March.

The hop at the Presidio on Monday evening was a particularly delightful one. Being the last one of the season, there was a supper, and after it the cotillion was danced, so that instead of breaking up at 11 o'clock as usual, the dance was prolonged until after one o'clock.

Miss Bert A. Fuller, daughter of W. P. Fuller, of the firm of Whittier, Fuller & Co., was married to Charles A. Kinkelin last Thursday. The groom is connected with the London, Paris and American Bank. The ceremony took place at 2336 Pacific avenue, the residence of the bride's mother.

A very enjoyable evening was spent at the Press Club on Thursday last, when the ladies of the city were entertained by the members. Owing to the efforts of the President, C. M. Coe, the club is now one of the best in the city, and is rapidly acquiring new and influential members.

Surgeon Wm. Martin, U. S. N. (retired), left on Thursday for the East. He will visit Chicago, New York, and Washington, and is to be gone several months.

Miss E. V. McCloskey, the well-known contralto singer, has returned from a visit to her relatives in the East, after an absence of several months.

The Verein Eintracht will give a masquerade ball at the Mechanics' Pavilion to-night. One of the attractions will be a grand march entitled "Four Hundred Years of American Life," being a representation of different periods in American history. Prizes amounting to $500 will be given away, and a military band of thirty-six pieces will furnish the music.

SOME OF OUR JUDGES.

A WORD ON TWO ARREST MEN WHO SIT ON THE BENCH

THE men who make it a habit to sit at the Bench remind one of the sign in the Montann dance hall, "Don't shoot the musicians. They are doing their best."

That is the unhappy position of the Judiciary of California. Every two years, at least, the instrument on which they are expected to play is tinkered by a lot of ignorant blacksmiths. If you permitted your tinker to put strings in your piano to suit the passing fancy of a tinker's brood, you should not be surprised when the result proves to be an expensive and not satisfying sort of noise.

It is the business of the Judiciary to make the laws dumped on it by the Legislative bod-carrier bear some sort of harmonious relation one to the other, and to those which have gone before, whether organic or specific. The Bench is the stomach of the Government, and its function is to digest the biennial meal of raw food prepared at Sacramento.

The law proposed by the "well-meaning person" is to blame for most of the legal dyspepsia from which the State suffers. It is an unhappy fact that the "well-meaning person" is quite often so fully satisfied with the benefit he confers on humanity by raising its moral average by the value of his personal equation, that he thinks it unnecessary to do more than signify his approval of the purpose of a given measure. He will not take the pains to ascertain the relative bearing of his plan on established principles of jurisprudence which cannot be set aside even though they happen to cut the throat of his pet reform. Hence the confusion and the imputation of unworthy motives to the Judiciary, which might have been averted had the "well-meaning person" taken the pains to inform himself of the rocks in the course of his ship. These are easily enough avoided by the legislative navigator who knows the way.

Perhaps you remember the sort of talk that went on during the pendency of the Hale & Norcross decision. It was a common thing to meet men who insisted that the decision was held back so long to help the speculators. If you asked whether the bears or the bulls were to be benefited by the delay they could not tell. Now, the truth of that story was that the decision hung so long because the acute sense of conscientious obligation actuating Chief Justice Beatty compelled him to devote prolonged and painful study to the case before he could make up his mind. That which should stand to his credit was turned to the flippant use of every man who believes it a smart thing to charge corrupt motives on men in authority. The Chief Justice is a man of tender conscience, steadfast in his opinion when he has made up his mind, but slow to judge, possibly too slow.

Justice Henshaw is a man of philosophic mind and consecutive thought, which, when he speaks, enables him to explain in luminous and vivid fashion. Like other lawyers, however, when he writes he is ridden by the involved and parenthetical sentence which so often makes legal opinions read like a page of mystery. It would be a blessing to bewildered humanity were our Judiciary trained to cultivate the short sentence. The treacherous pronoun trips them up, and the parenthesis lures them to the ruin of sense. Their training in the use of English has, for the most part, been oratorical, and the orator is sparing of verbs and spendthrift of the untameable pronouns. In a recent opinion by Judge Henshaw, otherwise admirable, more than one sentence dragged like a scotched snake, and with as little coherence. Nothing but laziness.

It might be thought disrespectful to call Justice McFarland a bird, but he always reminds one of the owl. "Mac," as they call him in Supreme Court circles, is a very human sort of bird, ready to give and take in the way of a joke. He was once knocked out of time by the unexpected and eager assault of Charles Wesley Reed. The Justice put some question or other to the counsel. The young lawyer stopped for an instant, and then pointing an eager finger at the Court, burst out:

"Now your Honor is quoting Macchiavelli on me—that the end justifies the means."

"Mac" gasped. To be accused of quoting Macchiavelli as authority in the Supreme Court was too much.

Judge McKenna is a patient man, considerate and pains-taking. The fortitude with which he has sat out the tiresome drone of the reading of the volumes of testimony in the Railroad Commission suit on trial in the United States Circuit Court was an example of judicial politeness for which he will never have full credit. The reading was a wholly unnecessary proceeding, and an absolute waste of time, but the lawyers insisted. It is impossible to appreciate and weigh testimony read in that perfunctory fashion, and every word must be read once more in the closet, in any event, but Judge McKenna sat it out like a Major until the lawyers got cold feet.

One sees with some amusement that Judge Murphy has been talking about "the scavengers of the press." Has anybody been putting the learned jurist in an ash-barrel recently?

THE OLD-FASHIONED GIRL.—TOWN TOPICS.

SHE'S only an "old-fashioned girl," she says, (is it not enough to disgrace?)

An "old-fashioned girl" with womanly ways,

And a winsome and womanly face;

A girl who is innocent, modest, and sweet,

Who is sensible, earnest, and true—

The kind that will surely be obsolete

In another short year or two.

She's never been seen a-straddle a wheel,

She doesn't ape man in her dress;

She doesn't write books on how she may feel

While receiving a lover's caress;

She doesn't use slang nor smoke cigarettes,

Nor talk of the freedom of sex;

She doesn't run after the "fashionable sets,"

And none of their follies affects.

She's only an "old-fashioned girl," you see,

And not in the least "up to date;"

But she is the kind of a girl for me,

And the kind that I want for a mate,

I know it is very "old-fashioned" to say

Your wife is a "saint from above"—

But I own I am fond of her "old-fashioned" way,

And proud of her "old-fashioned" love!

The third concert of the nineteenth season of the Loring Club will be given in Odd Fellows' Hall on Thursday evening, the 27th inst. The programme includes some very strong male voice choral numbers, and additional interest is given to it by the fact that Miss Ardella Mills will appear as soloist. The club has also engaged the services of Mr. B. Mollenhauer, violinist, and of Mrs. Carmichael-Carr as accompanist. Mr. D. P. Hughes, the director of the club, will conduct.

A handsome bouquet of flowers constitutes the most genteel gift imaginable. Charles M. Leopold, of 39 Post street, is the leading florist in this city, and always has the freshest flowers on hand. The Dashing Gay Soubrette.—THE CRITIC.

She was a dashing and gay soubrette,
When he was a lad in his Freshman year,
And she drew him in with her eyes of jet,
And cheapened herself to become his dear.

She was a dashing and gay soubrette,
When he was a senior of quiet ways,
And he called her his jewel, his idol and pet,
And wrote to her sonnets and roundelays.

She was a dashing and gay soubrette,
When he married, alas, and settled down;
Yet he'd sooner his business or rent forget
Than to miss the play when she was in town.

She was a dashing and gay soubrette,
When he was a grandpa old and wise,
And he'd sit for days and inward fret,
A-carrying her image before his eyes.

She was a dashing and gay soubrette.
When he died and they planted him under the sod;
While she, forsooth, is dancing yet,
And kicking her heels to the gallery god.

That woman according to her nature is meant to obey may be recognized from the fact that every woman who is placed in the, to her, unnatural position of complete independence, at once attaches herself to some man, by whom she lets herself be led and ruled, for the obvious reason that she requires a master. If she is young, it is a lover, if she is old, it is a confessor.—Schoenbauer.

"She burst into tears," the young novelist writes,
A pitiful thing to behold!
But still it was not fatal, for on the next page
"She collected herself," we are told.

But misses joints;
His friends may starve—
They give him points.
"These crooked wings,"
He sighs and says,
"Are harder things
Than sausages!"

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

H EALTHY children will develop into healthy citizens. Defective sanitation in the schools will ruin both.

T HE angel surmounting the City Hall may be somewhat mutilated, but she will serve our purposes just as well.

A NOTHER monitor, the Monadnock, is now in commission. A few more after the same pattern and we shall have a navy.

T HE crime of arson is growing rapidly. The penalty should be increased to life imprisonment, as the whole community is endangered.

A SIGN of returning prosperity and growing confidence is the demand for American securities in London. The outlook is a bright one all round.

F OOTPADDERY is again prevalent and should be punishable with the lash. Imprisonment, as a method of suppression, is entirely inadequate.

T HE improvement of the Presidio has long been a necessity. An important army post should contain the most modern accommodations for officers and men.

T HE religious discussion in the daily papers is gradually changing from the tedious to the vulgar. Had we less speech and more Christianity the world would be the gainer.

W ITH modern fortifications at Lime Point and a few good cruisers near at hand, San Francisco is beginning to feel what she really is—the Empress of the Western World.

M ORE money is needed in Armenia to help thousands of homeless women and children, robbed of their fathers by the late terrible massacres. New York has forwarded $25,000 already.

T HE ovation tendered Jameson and his men upon their arrival in London proves that, in spite of the charges against them, the Britishers are still admirers of good old-fashioned bravery.

T HE establishment of a free produce market on the water front will be an absolute boon to everybody in general. The consumer will pay less for his goods, and the farmer will be enabled to make a small profit.

T HERE appears to be some question about Inspector Dockery's right to a salary. Of all the reforms ever instituted in this city, that brought about by the Milk Inspector is one of the most beneficial, and he should be adequately compensated for it.

A PARAGRAPH appeared in one of the departments of this paper last week, stating that Judge Morrow would lecture before the Mechanics' Institute on the subject of "Six Years as a Statesman in Washington." It appears now that the subject quoted should have read "Six Years with Statesmen," and not as we had it. The fault was ours for having accepted, without verification, a statement appearing in that most accurate of all papers—the Examiner.

T HE indictment of election officers at Sacramento for permitting fraudulent and illegal voting, shows that the residents of that city are a wide-awake lot and dangerous to play with. The proceedings will have a healthy effect over the entire State.

I T is to be regretted that the most artistic spots of San Francisco are desecrated by vulgar advertising signs, placed there with the permission of property owners whose accumulative instincts are so great as to force them to sacrifice beauty for individual gain.

T HE world owes much to the late Edgar Wilson Nye. By his keen, clear wit, he amused millions of people and unwittingly lightened the little cares and troubles of many. His resting place is in the hearts of the people—a better place than the final abode of kings.

N OW that the pool rooms must close down, let the nickel-in-the-slot machines be done away with. Licensing them is a step in the right direction, but the present figure is not adequate for the harm they do. The Call's fight against the former evil was worthy of commendation.

T HE recent brutal proceedings on a St. Louis scaffold argue strongly against hanging as a mode of capital punishment. One may be averse to the idea of shedding blood, but the guillotine is speedy and accurate, and carries with it terrors that might put some stop to murder.

T HE charges against officers in the Revenue Cutter Service are becoming of too frequent occurrence. The gentlemen constituting the investigating committees should be fearless and unprejudiced in their methods and determined to bring offenders, irrespective of rank, to justice.

T HE arrest of a clergyman in this city for "violating the Park ordinances," and the subsequent withdrawal of the case against him at the request of the arresting officers, is a matter liable to leave grave doubts in the minds of intelligent men. If the officers were too zealous, as it is claimed they were, then decency demands that, in self defense, the minister should prosecute them for arresting him on such a charge. To hush the matter up is merely to leave the affair open to inference.

T HE annual election of Directors of the Donahue Road was held a few days ago. For some time past there has been some trouble in the directorate, owing to the workings of the Stetson syndicate, which gave President A. W. Foster no little amount of annoyance. The last election, however, resulted in a complete victory for the present President, the opposing syndicate being represented now by a minority only. This speaks highly for Mr. Foster and his capable and thoroughly efficient management, and it can safely be said that the future prospects of the road are good in the extreme.

T HE partition of Turkey is a possibility of the near future. The apparent friendly feeling in English diplomatic circles towards Russia, as evinced by Mr. Balfour's comments on the desire of that country to acquire an ice-free port in the Far East, is a sign that the old fear of Constantinople passing into the clutches of the Bear is passing away. A further rapprochement between the two nations is expected, and it can safely be asserted that with the forces of Russia at her command, Great Britain will be able to cope successfully with any possible European combination.

FAITH AND MORALS.

THE question of the guilt or innocence of Dr. Brown, which a church council has been called to determine, is being subordinated in public interest to certain psychological phenomena developed by the trial. The workings of the churchy mind are being revealed in a surprising, not to say an alarming, way. We are being given a very unusual opportunity to see inside the heads of a class of people who are commonly assumed to be much better than their neighbors.

Dr. Brown himself is wonderfully interesting. In the theological seminary and by thirty years of activity in the ministry, he has been trained to think after the fashion which is desired in its guides by his denomination. How very different his mental processes are from those of men outside the church is disclosed by the manner in which he has endeavored to break the force of Mrs. Stockton's evidence.

This woman testified, with much particularity, to tête-à-têtes in the pastor's study, long walks in secluded parts of the city, a visit to a private room in a restaurant, and, finally, gave to the Council a confession which would entitle the clergyman's wife to a divorce on Scriptural grounds. Dr. Brown meets this testimony by showing that Mrs. Stockton has blackmailed other men, that she has sinned with them freely, that she has no character, and is easily accessible—in short, that she is just the sort of woman who would have fallen into his arms on the first invitation, as she admits she did!

Mrs. Stockton herself is a curiosity. Young, good-looking, intelligent, still a member of Dr. Brown's church in good standing, and accustomed to the society of pious people, she goes upon the stand and owns to her unchastity with smiling cheerfulness. Her shamelessness does not seem to be at all the result of descent from a better state, but to an entire absence from her composition of the capacity for shame. A Kanaka girl of the pre-missionary era could not have been more animal-like in her unconsciousness of sin than this fair Congregationalist. She is not immoral, but simply non-moral, a pagan of Greece or Rome.

Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper is a lady whose Christian sincerity is quite safe from the assaults of enmity in this community. Nobody will believe that in whatever she does she is not animated by a pious desire to do what is right, as she sees the right. She is held in very high esteem as a saint, and undoubtedly deserves her repute. If there is any one among us who might naturally be expected to be horrified not only at Mrs. Stockton's conduct, but at Mrs. Stockton's sunny want of shame for that conduct, it is the good, the venerable, the religious Mrs. Cooper. Nevertheless, she has furnished the chief surprise of the whole scandal. "It is cruelly unjust," she said for print the other day, "the way that poor little woman is bounded. I have always loved her for herself, and have never known her to be aught but absolutely truthful. She is like a poor wounded bird."

What could be more confounding than this? It betrays the same moral blindness that Dr. Brown has exhibited throughout, the same astonishing inability to perceive the necessary logic of facts. Mrs. Cooper does not doubt that Mrs. Stockton has been guilty with Dr. Brown, and she demands that Dr. Brown shall be convicted and punished. Yet if Mrs. Stockton, poor thing, is only a wounded bird, what more, in the name of supernatural ornithology, is Dr. Brown, for whom Mrs. Cooper has no pity? It is not because he is a man that she condemns him, for she told the Council that she holds to the single standard for the sexes.

Opposed in battle to Mrs. Cooper are all the friends of the pastor in the church. They will helieve nothing evil of him, evidence or no evidence. Their loyalty to him is exactly analogous, in kind and degree, to that of Mrs. Cooper to her wounded bird, Mrs. Stockton. At the prayer meeting whereat the church's attitude toward the pastor was in question, one hundred and twenty members voted confidence in him, and sixty no confidence. It is not at all likely that the facts brought out at the trial will alter that proportion. Were anybody to rise and inform this congregation that two and two make four, and the statement was supposed to have a favorable hearing on Dr. Brown's case, the vote on the verity of the mathematical proposition would probably stand: For, 120; against, 60.

We see, therefore, that the Christian mind, as it is formed by a San Franciscan Congregational environment, is incapable of thinking as natural minds do; that inclination, not evidence, determines opinion. This strange mental state may be the outgrowth of the life-long habit of deeming the exercise of faith the highest of human virtues. It is, necessarily, a profoundly immoral and acutely dangerous condition for the human mind to be in, and its prevalence in Dr. Brown's congregation goes a long way toward accounting for Dr. Brown. If the clergy and laymen who comprise that wounded bird's judges are not better able to think than are the pastor himself, Mrs. Cooper, and her warring brethren and sisters, the white-washing of Dr. Brown may be counted on with assurance.

Judge Campbell's Sanctified Courage.

Everywhere, except among the clergy and that portion of the laity which is assured of salvation, there is observable a disposition to vilipend Judge

Campbell for the testimony which he gave at the Church Council regarding the charming but carnal Mrs. Stockton. The worldly take ground which the children of light do not comprehend.

"It may be true," argue those who in the last day will stand upon the left hand, "that everything happened just as Campbell says, but when a man takes a lady to the Maison Riche and does the regular thing in wine and oysters, no law, human or divine, ought to be able to drag from him a report of the ensuing conversation, the more especially if it happens to be compromising to the lady. A gentleman owes it to himself, if not to the too-trustful fair, to keep silent as to everything that is said. This old troglodyte of the Police Court has violated the great negative principle which governs kissing and telling. Therefore, let him be anathema."

Though honor, undoubtedly, is on the side of this view, it must be remembered that honor is a pagan, not a Christian, sentiment. It has seemingly been forgotten by the worldly that not more than a year ago Judge Campbell, together with Mayor Sutro, became a member of the Auxiliary of the Salvation Army. Recalling this happy fact, it is but just to assume that when the Judge arose in public to give his testimony for the Lord and Dr. Brown, he was actuated by a pious desire to do his duty as one of the household of faith. Think what it must have cost such a man to stand forth and confess his own sin—to own in the face of a sneering world that he had visited so godless a place as the Maison Riche. Surely there ought to be some sympathy for Brother Campbell, even among the reprobate, with whom he consorted before his eyes were opened. To confess that he went to the Maison Riche, purchased wine there, and when a lady had, as it were, thrown herself upon his breast, and poured out her fond, blackmailing soul to him, he resolved to expose her—that is no small cross for a member of the Salvation Army to shoulder.

Though the unregenerate may scorn him for offering Mrs. Stockton, or any woman who drank his wine and confided in him, upon the altar of truth, the charitable will consider that Judge Campbell has a right to entertain the claims of a conscience rendered sensitive by grace. He has at least proved his courage, his readiness to endure the contempt of men for righteousness' sake. And he is not without his reward. Dr. Brown has publicly thanked him.

The Art of Listening.

It has long been customary to abuse the members of the gentler sex for their apparent lack of the appreciation of the beauty of silence. Wherever women congregate, there, so tradition has long held, must the spirit of unrest be—the ceaseless ripple of flippant laughter, the penetrative, serpentine whisper, the continuous and annoying rustle of silk and of well-starched linen. Men, on the other hand, are supposed to have acquired more dignity than their willowy sisters; they are supposed to be above committing the petty annoyances so commonly attributed to the other sex. In short, they are supposed to have learned the art of being still when occasion demands it, and of keeping their individual mouths closed, and their feet at rest, when the attention of an audience is being monopolized by some charmer of the senses. Out of justice to the women it must be stated that, in the main, this idea is wrong. It is not the women but the men who, more often than not, are guilty of the annoyances already alluded to and of others far worse as well.

Take the recent Paderewski recitals, for instance. During the afternoon performances, patronized largely by ladies and young girls, the silence was nearly always absolute and, occasionally, even oppressive. Here and there might be heard a suggestion of whispering—some faint exclamation lured forth from the breast of an over-excited woman or tender-hearted maid; but that was all. As a rule, the audience was of marble—flesh-bued. During the evening performance, on the other hand, when the audience included a large proportion of men, a decided difference could be noted. Coughing, shuffling of feet, even expectoration and clearing of throats, seemed to be the rule rather than the exception. It is possible that with coarser instincts the men considered such offenses of little account, and that long hours at the counter and the desk unfitted them for appearance in the concert-chamber and the parlor. However, the fact cannot be gainsaid that their conduct was not that of gentlemen in the highest sense of the word, but rather of well-dressed boors. It is to be understood that these statements do not apply to all the gentlemen present at the concerts. The very fact that there were gentlemen present, will suffice to place the blame where it rightly belongs. In genteel behavior there is no such thing as sex, and those person, who offend an audience with bad manners should be requested to step outside upon the street where they belong so that those remaining can revel in enjoyment undisturbed.

With our theatres it is practically the same thing. Here and there a thoughtless woman may make herself conspicuous, even as a child in the gallery may occasionally cry out in the ecstasy of enjoyment, but, on the whole, the feminine portion of the audience is silent and attentive, and annoyance can usually be traced to the men. In fact, if things continue as they are at present, the management of our leading theatres will be compelled to present each male escort with a cough drop or a sedative, neatly folded in a programme, as a gentle hint that the actors alone are the ones to attract the attention of the audience.

The Movement For Cleaner Streets.

The Merchants' Association has the support of public sentiment in the effort to secure a better system of street sprinkling for this city. The success of the movement for cleaner streets is so great as to constitute almost a revolution in the condition of the highways, particularly in respect to Market street. The method of sweeping by hand, introduced and established here by the Association, has made our principal streets far more inviting to pedestrians than ever before. The removal of dirt in this way has gone far to banish the long-standing nuisance of dust, that has long made San Francisco the jest of visitors in the summer season. What is now needed is a good system of watering the streets. So long as the sprinkling is left to the tender mercies of contractors, whose sole object is to make as much money out of it as possible, the public must suffer. With the Association in charge of the work, the maximum of efficiency will be reached, with the minimum of cost. This is no small matter, but one in which every public-spirited citizen must feel an interest. With clean and well-watered streets, there is no reason why San Francisco should not be one of the most pleasant of cities even in the summer season.

The Flagler Sentence.

The sentence imposed on Miss Flagler of Washington, who shot a negro boy in August of last year, will surely be adversely commented upon by the different journals of the country. Her crime, so the Judge sentencing her considered, could be condoned by imprisonment for three hours in the jail and a fine of five hundred dollars. This it seems to us, is a mere parody on justice. It were better to have let her off without any punishment whatever than to have established a precedent of this description. Moreover, if a negro boy, aged eight, is worth only five hundred dollars, an able-bodied man servant of forty years will be found to be worth twenty-five hundred. They are hardly worth making at that price.

"Purity" Popper on Bribes.

It is well that good citizens should have their memories jogged occasionally as to the records of men endeavoring to worm into their confidence, only to betray them. We allude to Max Popper, and what he is trying to do. A grand sachem of the Iroquois political club, an active member of the Junta now trying to control the municipal government, and a pretended reformer of the loud-mouthed kind, it is fit and proper that the public should be given an opportunity to view him in the light of the record he has heretofore chosen to make for himself. No man has a reasonable right to complain of being judged by his own acts. He is entitled to no less, and, if he asks more, he is but endeavoring to impose upon public forgetfulness and credulity. Max Popper's record is that of a sleek and well-fed Buckley lamb. By the blind ex-Boss he was put forward as a figure-head for all sorts of schemes. In the direst and darkest days of Buckleyism, when every act that an official could perform was for sale, Max Popper was "the blind white devil's" lieutenant. Nay, more; it proved ultimately that the two were secret partners in bribery, corruption, and the fruits thereof. Popper himself, on the final falling out over the spoils, said he was, swore he was, and finally, when the Grand Inquest of the county called upon him to testify as to the facts, he put in the felon's plea that he dare not confess to more, because, if he did, he would criminate himself. He admitted, however, that he was a partner of Buckley's in the street sweeping contract, and that out of its profits they paid a subsidy presumed to reach certain Supervisors. Such is the man who is now seeking to worm himself into public confidence, to the end, it is fair to presume, that he may cinch Spring Valley stockholders, and those of other corporations, and do as he did before. This timely reminder to the wise should suffice.

The Deadly Trolley.

The trolley-car still continues to claim its fair share of victims. Not alone in San Francisco, but in every large city where the trolley system is in use a certain number of people continue to be sacrificed to this modern car of Juggernaut. It is ridiculous to assert that the accidents are wilful and that the motormen alone are to blame whenever a person meets death in this manner. No amount of carefulness on the motor man's part can counterbalance the seemingly wilful carelessness of pedestrians who, as a matter of fact, tempt Providence by running before every car even when there is no necessity of so doing. The instinct seems to be inborn among us not to be second in any race and occasionally we pay for it with our lives. The recent numerous mishaps have shown that the trolley is nearly ungovernable when running at a high rate of speed, and the only way to guard against future misfortunes—seeing that we cannot very well change human nature—will be to so regulate the speed at which they may travel that neither those on foot nor the riders in the car will ever be subject to any danger. A delay of a few minutes may possibly be occasioned but will be more than counterbalanced by the saving in human lives.

The School Question.

Now that Principal O'Connor has been declared absolutely guiltless of the charges of using ungrammatical language to the pupils under him, the question crops up as to what were Mr. Henderson's reasons for preferring them against him. The Board of Education should inquire into the matter and see if such a man is really worthy of being a School Director. If not, he should be immediately deposed from his position and a better man put in his place. The welfare of the community is largely dependent upon its school children, and competent school teachers must be protected at all costs in the different ways to which they may resort to inculcate in their pupils the first principles of discipline and of obedience. Mr. O'Connor has merely done his duty in the way he considered best, and so is entitled to the gratitude and respect of the parents of this city. Mr. Henderson, on the other hand, has made an apparently unwarranted attack upon a good man, and should be brought to account for it.

The Impolicy Of Christian Missions.

The slaughter of devoted Christian Armenians by the fanatical Turks may well give a check to Christian missions throughout the world.

What is to be gained by converting people to a faith which serves to expose them to massacre? If missionaries were rational in their undertaking, they would readily perceive the evil results of their labors, but it is vain to hope for any practical view of the matter among them. But in the Christian world as a whole, which subscribes the money for the support of foreign missions, this matter should receive a most careful attention. Has Christianity made the Armenians happy, or has it, on the whole, been the source of misery, grief, despair and death among them? The Christian world was once thoroughly imbued with the fanatical notion that no one but a Christian could be saved from hell. But this idea, the original source of the millions of dollars that have been spent for the conversion of the heathen, cannot now have much potency. People of liberal views must at last recognize that there are other religions of great merit, as well as Christianity. Of late years Buddhists have even come from India to convert Christians to the "Light of Asia." In China, it appears, the efforts of missionaries have done little more than to endanger the lives of all foreigners who penetrate the interior of that country. And so elsewhere. Henceforth, before professing Christians subscribe money for the conversion of the heathen in distant lands, let them look upon the want and wretchedness, the sin and suffering, in their own country. Christianity, in the most Christian nations, has become a mere shell, a hollow mockery, the cover for every form of selfishness, hypocrisy and sham. There is more need at home of genuine missionary effort than there is anywhere abroad.

Are There Not Greater Mysteries?

May not the so-called cathode ray have its counterpart in the realm of metaphysics? A few years ago the wonders accomplished in photography by this new light would have been scouted as impossible. The idea of taking pictures through "opaque" bodies would have seemed to the most scientific no less than absurd. Yet that is what the experimenters are now doing in every large city in the land. Before long the new photography will be of practical use in surgery and many of the arts. In view of this astonishing triumph of patient investigation, almost superhuman as it appears, shall any one venture to say that some method of veritable mind-reading, reducible to scientific principles, may not eventually be discovered? Is it not possible that there exists, as yet unsuspected and unknown, some psychological means of revealing the processes of the mind and the secret play of emotion? Fakirs and self-styled mediums have at times appeared to have gained a hint of some mysterious power, if such there be; and there are a multitude of mental phenomena which can scarcely be explained on any other hypothesis than that there exists some unknown means of inter-communication between mind and mind, over and above the familiar evidences of the senses. Now that the cathode ray is penetrating the utter darkness of the physical world, regardless of obstruction, it behooves us all to let in a little light of faith and hope upon the dark places of our own minds. Possibly the new light may banish some of that prevailing scepticism which scouts the existence of things unseen and invisible. With all our nineteenth century wisdom, we may at last be forced to confess that there are more things in heaven and earth than have been dreamt of in our philosophy.

The Governor and the Colonel.

If Colonel John P. Irish had drawn his sword and declared war on Governor Budd before the latter had removed him from office, or had the Colonel voluntarily retired from the service of the State, his present military position would be much stronger. As things stand, the Governor will get the benefit of the theory that the pain suffered by Colonel Irish in having his head chopped off accounts for the poignancy of his wrath at the defects of the Administration. "This wretch," says the mutilated Colonel, speaking of his late honored chief, "is traducing

California and libeling his own State for the purpose of gaining a demagogue's advantage." These are stout words. They do not apply to the Colonel's discharge but to the Governor's alleged practice of juggling with figures in order to make it appear that the cost of government in California is much greater than in most other States. Colonel Irish thinks it is less, which is important if true, and the taxpayers would be very much surprised should he be able to prove it to them. He would have a much better chance of getting a respectful hearing were he to moderate his transports of indignation and play the hose of discretion upon his blazing vocabulary. It is hard to accept him as a competent witness when he cries out against the Governor as "a wretch," and then describes him as a "fool fakir" for having substituted another management of the Home for the Adult Blind for that given it by Colonel Irish and his co-trustees.

That Governor Budd is a politician with a fully developed sense of the value of patronage was known before Colonel Irish launched at him the thunders of his eloquence. It is also known that the Colonel is not a political novice. Hence the average citizen will be inclined to retain his composure while the lightnings of crimination and recrimination are exchanged. Experience has taught that such displays, however terrifying to the unaccustomed eye, are usually bogus and harmless. The one important thing in the conflict is Colonel Irish's declaration as to the relatively low cost of government in California. If he has it in his power to make good his statement every property owner must hope that Governor Budd will not head off demonstration by giving the Colonel another office.

Sunshine in San Francisco.

If San Francisco were as keenly alive to the money value of climatic charms as is Los Angeles, some systematic effort would be made to advertise throughout the East the exceeding loveliness of the February weather our people have enjoyed. It would be almost past belief, to millions of Eastern readers, that this city is favored with as delightful winter days as fall to the lot of any city in the world. Unfortunately, San Francisco has a reputation rather for the harshness of her summer breezes than for the mildness and sunniness of her winters. And yet the truth is that Los Angeles has more frost each winter, as a rule, than this city, and that here the most delicate plants and flowers may be seen in January and February growing in profusion out of doors, without any sort of protection from frost. An easy way to spread abroad the truth regarding our winter climate would be the publication, in the Eastern cities, of daily telegraphic bulletins, from the U. S. Weather Bureau, giving the extremes and means of temperature here. The slight cost of this undertaking would be returned a hundred-fold in the stimulus imparted to tourist travel in this direction. It is common to wonder how it is that Eastern people are not drawn to the northern part of the State as they are to the southern section. While it is true that causes other than those of a climatic nature contribute to the progress of Southern California, as contrasted with the inertia of the northern and central parts of the State, it remains a fact that climate is the great attraction and the chief factor in the development of the South. No pains should be spared to keep the beauty of our winter weather constantly paraded before the people of the ice-bound East, and in time San Francisco will become famous as the great winter resort of North America.

A Bad Policy.

German insurance companies are prohibited from doing business in the State of New York because American companies may not enter Germany. This action is to be condemned as likely to foster ill-feeling between the two nations. A retaliatory policy never has good results.

The Army Trouble.

The trouble in the ranks of the Salvation Army is to be regretted. The Army has probably done more good than all the other religious bodies put together and internal dissensions can only result in weakening it materially.

A Woman Of The Frontier. A plucky woman is Mrs. Willis of Tacoma. Last year she made a trip into the wilds of Alaska, looking for a business opening. She found what she wanted, and has again plunged into the wilderness. Her destination is Circle City, a rough mining camp on the Yukon river. The place is reached only by a long and perilous journey including a thousand miles of sledging over the snow, and a voyage by canoe down swift and rocky streams, where navigation is not only difficult but dangerous. She takes with her the required outfit for the bakery, and proposes to build with her own hands the canoes necessary to transport her equipment over the water part of the route. Mrs. Willis says she sees no reason why a woman should not make the journey; that "hundreds of weak men have accomplished it." So she is travelling alone, with eight stout dogs to draw her sleds and to protect her from wild animals. Her husband is an invalid, and unable to rough it. All honor to this brave woman. She is of a good old heroic type, such as trial and adversity have developed in all ages. There is nothing of the "new woman" about her. She does not waste time in talking about woman's rights, but has earnestly sought and found a place where a business woman could make an honest living and accumulate a provision for her family. And yet, admirable as Mrs. Willis is in her way, it must be confessed that men would not regard this type with favor were it not exceptional. Few men would like to see all women fashioned after this masculine pattern. The boldness, the energy and self-reliance that enable this good woman to undertake her arduous and unsafe expedition are distinctly masculine qualities. If such traits were common to women, the subjection of men might be a theme for the feminine orators of the day. The degeneration of the male would be inevitable under such conditions, and the female would take his place as the head of the family. There are a number of shouting women in San Francisco whom the public would be glad to see start out on a voyage to Circle City, or some other remote point in the far North, but the energies of these declamatory dames are confined to agitation for woman suffrage and are not available for any arduous or useful work.

Military Drill in Public Schools. The recommendation of the Secretary of War to introduce military instruction, by officers of the regular army, into the public schools is one well worthy of adoption. The first thing a young boy should learn is to obey, and subjection to military discipline, even if only for one hour a day, is more likely to teach him this than any amount of hardship he may undergo upon leaving school. Few of the lads attending our public schools are able to carry themselves as becomes their age, yet it is a well known fact that they are not overburdened with tasks. The boy, in fact, is usually his own master and the ill effects of the present system are making themselves visible in his ever-growing tendency to shirk work. Military training would certainly put a little enthusiasm into him and make him better able to cope with the world when the time comes for him to do so. Another beneficial effect will be that should the country ever need soldiers to ward off foreign invaders, a strong and patriotic reserve force of young men can be counted on to render effective service. As many of them drift into the militia, the efficiency of that body will be raised, and altogether a stronger looking set of men will grow up than those we see at present slouching along our public streets.

Dangerous Nuisances. The Chinese New Year festivities, as well as their customs of letting off firecrackers upon every conceivable occasion and burning punk upon the public streets, constitute a continual menace to the city. Should the English, French or other foreign residents of San Francisco see fit to celebrate their particular holidays in such a dangerous and noisy manner, it is safe to say that the police would speedily interfere. But because the offenders are Chinese and Chinatown is one of the "sights," the offense is overlooked and the annoyance and danger to resident citizens allowed to continue. The fire hazard in this city is large enough and any efforts to minimize it may save us the expense of a terrible conflagration.

An Astonishing Suggestion. Dr. Fitch of this city is credited with the remarkable recommendation that our Board of Supervisors should memorialize Congress, to the end that a national leper settlement be established somewhere in the foothills of this State "where the lepers of the United States could have a large area of country over which to roam, among the fruits and flowers." This is one of the most astonishing ideas ever advanced by any member of the medical profession in this city. The good doctor's humanity seems to have far outstripped his regard for the welfare of the State. It would indeed, be a truly unselfish thing for California to invite to her hillsides the lepers from all other parts of the Union; but how will our own people like to have their State made the Mecca for these unfortunates? What have the dwellers of the foothills to say to the suggestion that the lepers from everywhere be invited to "roam among the fruits and flowers"? It is safe to say that Dr. Fitch's brilliant project will never find much encouragement. Bad enough it is that the consumptives from the East come hither in multitudes, spreading more or less contagion among the healthful of our own population. Let us therefore draw the line at leprosy. Instead of inviting the lepers, let us, as far as possible, exclude them from the State, and send from our shores all those who have already contracted this dread disease. If necessary, the Government of the United States might well set apart some island off her coast line as a refuge for persons thus afflicted, but even this provision the Pacific Coast would prefer to have made somewhere on the Atlantic confines of the continent.

Trouble Brewing in Canada. Canada is likely to experience much tribulation over the new Manitoba School Bill. This is a measure framed by the Dominion Government, in accordance with the ruling of the British Privy Council. When Manitoba was induced to enter the Dominion, it was a condition of the confederation that her separate schools should be protected. But the local legislature, ignoring this compact, adopted some time ago a school law under which the Catholic schools or other sectarian schools, received no share of public money, while all property-owners were alike taxed for the support of the common schools. However correct in principle was this legislation, the Catholics regarded it as a violation of the guaranty given them by the Dominion Government. The latter refused to interfere unless the Privy Council should so direct. The decision of that tribunal seems to offer no alternative, and the new bill is designed to restore separate schools in Manitoba. It provides State aid for Catholic as well as for the common schools. Each taxpayer is required to elect whether he will support a separate or a common school: he must support one or the other. The Protestant majority in Manitoba, which controls the local government, is likely to rebel against this measure, and it is of a nature to keep all Canada disturbed for a long time to come. Religious differences there have to be reckoned with by the politicians. The province of Quebec is mainly French and Catholic, while the other provinces of the Dominion are overwhelmingly Protestant.

Merely Temporary. The unfortunates in the city's dark places have been ordered to vacate their present quarters under penalty of arrest. From the standpoint of the armchair moralist this is a decided victory over vice. It is hard to see, however, how, by simply hounding the poor women from one place to another, their condition, or that of the city, is in any way bettered. Few women sin from choice, and the crime of this century is that we waste our efforts fighting effects rather than the causes that bring them about.

A California Product. The City Hall Commissioners did the right thing when they decided that only California stone should be used for the wainscoting of the City Hall dome. The material at our disposal is all that can be desired and native industries should always be given the preference when possible. It is to be regretted that the stone work about the new ferry depot is not to be from the same location.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

EDITOR NEWS LETTER, Sir:—Last week I referred to an article in the Overland Monthly for the present month of February by Mr. Irving M. Scott, on "Hard Times" and now return to the subject to point out more inaccuracies of assertions made by Mr. Scott and in the hope that if he again essays to advise the people what to do, he will be more careful about his statistics. The following occurs in his article:

In 1889 the silver mines of the United States yielded $64,800,000, equal to two-thirds of the silver yield of the balance of the world. In 1894, owing to the great depreciation in the price of silver, many of our silver mines were compelled to stop work, and our yield of silver was, as measured in gold, $14,350,000. The indications are that the silver yield of our mines this year will not exceed $1,000,000. Not only have the demonetizing acts with respect to silver reduced the world's redemption money fully fifty per cent, but they have palsied its powers of recuperation—have effected a scarcity of money, and thereby infested our Country's doors with countless packs of ravenous wolves.

If Mr. Scott had referred to any current statistical authority—abstracts, atlases, government bureau reports, or even newspaper almanacs—he could have materially lessened the surprising inaccuracy of these statements. He says the yield of silver as measured in gold, was for 1894, $14,350,000. As a matter of fact it was, measured in gold (commodity value), in round figures approximately $32,000,000; in 1895, $36,000,000. He states that the indications are that the yield of silver this year will not exceed the sum of $4,000,000. I beg to offer the assurance that the indications are that the product of silver in the United States for this year of 1896 will approximate $40,000,000, commodity value.

Mr. Scott takes the year of 1889 as a criterion, which I accept and will mention that the total product of the Pacific Coast and Rocky Mountain States and Territories, gold, silver, copper and lead, all of which are in the aggregate intimately related in their production throughout that section, and the falling off in commercial value, was only 8 per cent. in 1895 as compared with 1889; the gold product of the same localities for 1895, as compared with 1889, showing an increase of over 50 per cent. If we take our sister republic of Mexico into account, we find that the total product there of 1889 was $42,000,000, gold and silver combined, mintage ratios,—and for 1895 it was $59,000,000—an increase in the six years of 42 per cent. The production of gold alone in the world during 1865 was very considerably more than the combined product of gold and silver thirty years ago.

To go into the question of the world's product, as Mr. Scott applies his argument to the world in setting forth what he deems the evils of the gold standard, I have to say that we find upon reference to authorities that the production of gold (I am again speaking of gold and silver as commodities) was in 1874, $91,000,000; in 1876, $104,000,000; in 1878, $119,000,000; in 1890, $120,000,000; in 1892, $147,000,000; in 1894, $180,000,000; and in 1895, $200,000,000, breaking all previous records. Silver represented in 1870, $51,000,000; in 1874, $70,000,000; in 1884, $91,000,000; in 1894, $106,000,000; in 1895, $120,000,000. The price of silver in 1889-90 was artificial—arising from speculation incident to the then confident fallacy in the United States of government power to create values by legislative enactment.

By reference to pages 40 and 41 of the Report for 1895 of the Director of the U. S. Mint, Mr. Scott will find that of the $4,070,000,000 of silver money in the world, $3,440,000,000, or 85 per cent. is full tender, and that 60 per cent. of that is in Oriental lands. But the status does not confer upon silver there any greater commodity value than in the United States, and never did. Always and every where from the dawn of history alongside of any legal ratio whatever there is a commodity ratio that fixes the real value of the metals.

In one of our city dailies of Monday, the 24th, a prominent divine, commenting upon the moral status of San Francisco and California indulged in extremely severe reflections, and if Mr. Scott's assertion regarding countless packs of ravenous wolves infesting our country's doors is accurate, not only the condition of San Francisco and California but the entire country is certainly very deplorable. He may well cry with Hamlet:

The time is out of joint: O cursed spite,
That ever I was born to set it right!

However, I am not disposed to take so pessimistic a view of the situation.

Mr. Scott opens and closes his articles with the following quotation from Virgil:

"To the shades you go a down-hill, easy way;
But to return, and rejoin the day
That is a work, a labor."

Something like this would be more pertinent: "How difficult it is to get back to the path of truth after floundering in the slough of error."

The Hard Times, which we all deplore and which Mr. Scott pathetically bewails, are the legitimate results of pernicious economic methods in commerce and finance—namely, of the delusion that the Government can create value by statutory enactment, and make the people rich by taxation. Patience, hard work, and frugal economy are the only remedies for the ills we have drawn upon our own shoulders, and which we must bear until relieved by common sense methods of our own devising. As Emerson says, "We pay a price for everything we get."

A LAYMAN.

THISTLE DOWN.

Sacramento had a madman in the pulpit the other day. So have we, brothers, and plenty of them.

Corbett is said to have swung his mouth into action, and is now ready for a long argument with Fitzsimmons.

Dr. Nansen may not have discovered the Pole, but he failed to lose himself. Hence his claim to be rewarded.

A Stockton man, called Cloek, dropped dead in that city a few days ago. Needless to say, he was not wound up.

Another San Jose man has preferred imprisonment to marriage. This speaks badly for the fair sex in that part of the country.

A new development is said to be the telephone ear. In the case of the central girls, this is merely another word for total deafness.

A mau in Berlin is said to have a skin impervious to bullets or knife wounds. Only an office-seeker could have a skin as thick as that.

A Syrause divine states that the Devil has a Bible of his own. It was probably published for the private edification of the ministers.

A Pennsylvania man lived for many years without an ounce of brains in his head. Had he had any he would have come to California long ago.

Kovalev, the murderer, refused to take a bath on the morning of his execution. He probably preferred to have his sins washed away on the other side.

The two French statesmen who were to have fought a duel were subjected to the cathode rays, and the fact was revealed that neither had any backbone. The fight is, therefore, off.

Dr. Weudell C. Phillips, of New York, urges husbands not to buy sealskins for their wives, claiming that they are unhealthy. Presumably, the Doctor is a bachelor and contemplates matrimony.

Professor Garner has returned from Africa with fresh data concerning the speech of monkeys. He refuses, however, to give any clue to the remarks he overheard, which, judging from the newspaper cuts of him, may possibly have been highly complimentary.

A Hartford sculptor has designed a statue of the Archangel Gabriel awaiting the last Trump, and prides himself upon being the first to place him in a sitting posture. Had the sculptor any originality whatsoever, he would have fixed him up snugly ensconced in a folding bed.

—Dr. Parkhurst, besides being a great preacher, is also a first-class organist, and is able to play at evening services in his own church when necessary. As a boy he was fond of music, and would walk miles to take his lesson.

Mistress (calling upstairs)—What on earth are you doing to that child, Sarah, to make it scream so? SARAH—Nothing, ma'am. I'm spanking it to make it stop.

A Book of Ireland has not produced great national writers of fiction. Her literature is, perhaps, the least conspicuous of her achievements.

In fact, with the exception of Miss Edgeworth, who was Ireland's first national novelist, that country cannot claim any great author in fiction who was racy of the soil. But Richard Henry Stoddard, who, we see, agrees with us on this point, might have given the reasons why Ireland has not produced great writers as she has great orators and great soldiers. But in his review of "Strangers at Lisconnell," a review, by the way, which induced us to read the book, he points out the paucity of great Irish writers, but for that paucity he gives no cause. Would it not have been just to "the most distressful country" to remind us that when the school-house is closed it is not fair to charge the people with being illiterate? And do we not know that for 180 years it was a crime to teach the Catholics of Ireland even the rudiments of education, and that the sons of Irish Catholic gentlemen were obliged to go abroad for their education, even down to the first quarter of the present century? If, then, Ireland has not produced great writers of fiction, may we not in justice lay some of the blame on those who pronounced the dictum, and enforced the law, that the education of an Irish Catholic was a crime? And so we find that, with the exception of Miss Edgeworth, that Ireland is barren of great writers, even down to the present hour. And by "Irish" writers we mean writers of Irish birth as well as of Irish extraction. The two best known Irish authors of the last century were Sheridan and Goldsmith, but they were Irish only by the accident of birth, and their best works were not racy of the soil. They thought, and wrote, and had all the feelings of the Englishman of their day, and their most quoted books and passages were essentially English in tone and temperament. And to some extent this was equally true of the writings of Moore and Swift. Both had occasional outbursts of Irish wit and pathos, but take their works all in all, they were dominated by English ideas. But Miss Edgeworth was essentially Irish, in birth, in family tradition, and in feeling. Her works have become classic, and it was her success in picturing the life around her that led Scott to do the same for his own people; and to this fact may be primarily attributed the "Waverley Novels." But while Miss Edgeworth founded no school for others, yet she had many followers, and we know no one who has so successfully approached her as Miss Jane Barlow, whose book, "Strangers at Lisconnell," we have just read. And as a delineator of the manners of the poorest of her country people we are not sure that she does not come nearer to Miss Edgeworth than any Irish novelist of whom we know. She loves to bring us into the humble cabin of the "bog-trotter." She shows us the simple life of the "crotter," and she tells us all about the customs, habits, joys and sorrows of the people as those things are understood under the thatch of the tenant farmers of Ireland. Her book is all about the "common people," and should be read as such.

Unlike Miss Edgeworth, Miss Barlow does not appear to care much for plot, but it is her character drawing that gives value to her productions, and which places her at the head of the Irish novelists of the day. Her desire appears to be to chronicle "the short and simple annals of the poor," and she has succeeded to the letter. As a writer, Miss Barlow has not, indeed, succeeded in attracting attention to Irish life as Mr. Barrie, or Mr. Crockett, or Mr. Watson have to Scottish life, and yet her stories are just as good as theirs. But they have something in common, and that is they all belong to-day, and any one who wants to know the Ireland of this hour cannot do better than read Miss Barlow, just as any one who wants to know the Scotland of to-day cannot do better than read Barrie, Watson, or Crockett. And it is for this reason that this book, "Strangers at Lisconnell," will repay perusal. People who ask why the Irish are so poor, with a soil so bountiful and a climate so good, will here find what is, in some respects, an explanation. Not since the days of "Castle Rackrent," that masterpiece of Miss Edgeworth's, has a better story of Irish life appeared, and, while we question some of Miss Barlow's conclusions, we see so much of the true picture of Irish life held up before us that we hesitate to find fault with what is, generally, so accurate a production. But the reader must not expect a novel after the Braddon, the Warden, the Hardy, or the Meredith style. In fact of plot "Strangers at Lisconnell" is comparatively destitute, but the mud cabin, the barefooted children, the struggle for existence, the thirst for land, the, so-called, "superstitions" of the people, and the home life of "Pat" and "Bridget," this story is, in our judgment, the best that has appeared for many a day. If it be true that "the proper study of mankind is man," then Miss Barlow has brought that study before us with affecting reality. That she is a "great" writer we will not admit, but, just as Mrs. Humphrey Ward brought rustic life in England before us in "Bessy Costrell," so does Miss Barlow bring rustic life in Ireland before us in "Strangers at Lisconnell," always remembering, however, that Mrs. Humphrey Ward can build a plot, and Miss Barlow cannot. At least, the absence of plot induces us to believe that construction is Miss Barlow's weak point, and that she is strong only in description.

* "Strangers at Lisconnell," by Miss Jane Barlow.

The didacticism of the late Professor Longfellow has been the means of making many an imitator mistake the cowl for the garland. Lowell, for instance, with all his individualism, appears to have followed Longfellow's footsteps in poetry, and Dr. Smiles and Mr. Anson Marden write as if they were following him in prose. Indeed, Mr. Marden's book, "Architects of Fate," embodies sentimental fallacies which are only equaled by Longfellow when he wrote:

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us
Footsteps in the sands of time."

Very pretty, but seldom true, when we remember that the "lives" of so many "great men" are full to the brim of fraud and mendacity. We could give the names of many, very many, "great men," whose "lives" were infamous—but then, of course, much depends on whom we call "great." However, Mr. Marden's book is not literature—it is merely a sermon.

"Living Topics Cyclopaedia" is a "record of recent events and of the world's progress in all departments of knowledge." It is, in fact, a supplement to all high-class cyclopedias, and, as often as the alphabet is covered, a new series will begin. It is, of course, useful and instructive, but we have our doubts about its success. By the time the alphabet is completed, and the "living topics" beginning with X Y Z are published, the "living topics" beginning at A B C will be dead and buried. A book something like this is wanted in every library, and yet we do not think that this idea quite meets the want.

In "Cavalry in the Waterloo Campaign," General Sir Evelyn Wood, V. C., acknowledges that the French army was at that time made up of raw recruits, many of whom were not particularly loyal to Napoleon, and he gives this as the one great reason why the French were not able to cope with their enemies. But students of history know that the French were near "coping" with their enemies, and successfully, too.

"The Non-Heredit of Inebriety" is a timely book by Leslie E. Keeley, M. D. LL.D. As a contribution to an unsettled question it will be welcomed by medical men and specialists, and, as it is a subject on which none but medical men or specialists are capable of forming an exact opinion, we must leave it in their hands to decide whether Dr. Keeley is right or wrong.

Mr. Algernon Charles Swinburne has just issued a book of poems at a penny a copy. This reminds us of the freak of a poet named Richard Hengist Horne, who once brought out his classical epic of "Orion" at a farthing a copy.

Professor James Bryce, M. P., the author of "The American Commonwealth," is to publish a group of papers on "South Africa" in a leading magazine.

THE Gilligs and the Henry Normans, during their various wanderings, have recently had a reunion in London, with incidental good times. The three column article in the Bulletin one night last week on Normau, which was copied from a great London weekly, omitted his San Francisco sojourn in enumerating his many exploits. Now that he is second in command on the London Morning Chronicle he is a great personage, and every drawing room in London is open to himself and his talented wife. But, speaking of Norman's three months' stay in San Francisco, which ended in such a disastrous finale for our wealthiest newspaper proprietor, Bohemian clubmen will not forget the very amusing and uproarious episode one night at old Mrs. Hunt's lodging-house, on Montgomery avenue, the resort from time immemorial of artists, authors, and "odd fish." Stevenson, Bierce, McEwen, Strong, Dennis McCarthy, Virgil Williams—in short, dozens of them have had rooms at Mrs. Hunt's. But in the spring of 1888 Mrs. J. D. Strong had established a very beautiful Hawaiian studio in a suite of several pretty rooms. It was draped with all sorts of South Sea Island trophies, such as mats and straw tapestries, and adorned with many beautiful sketches from the artist's brush. Mrs. Gillig—Mrs. Amy Crocker then—was a great admirer of Mrs. Strong, and frequently visited her picturesque den with friends. One night there was an elaborate studio reception given, to which came Mrs. Amy and several friends, also. Frank Unger, Henry Norman, Ned Townsend, and, if memory mistakes not, Charlie Leonard.

They all spent a delightful evening in music and conversation, and Henry Norman recited his favorite, "Omar Khayyam," to the end three times.

Meanwhile, old Mrs. Hunt, the rigid landlady of seventy winters, who hailed from pioneer days in Virginia City, was laid up with rheumatism flat on her back. She listened to the music and revelry with fury and dismay.

Finally the climax came. At Ned Townsend's suggestion a messenger was dispatched to the Palace Hotel for Norman's camera and flashlight powder. On the arrival of these articles, the company was grouped and the light turned out. The studio was large, and well worthy of an artistic evening photograph. Mr. Norman, when all was ready, having taken a sufficient supply from the large box of his English flashlight powder, calmly lighted a taper and touched off the contents of the box itself—through sheer accident, of course. The long French windows that have been in the building since it was Maguire's Opera House, fell mostly into the street. Every picture and sketch in the room flew pell-mell from the walls, together with the mats. The stove fell over Frank Unger's arm, bruising it somewhat. Norman and Townsend were driven helter-skelter into the remnants of the calendar.

The ladies present preserved their equanimity delightfully, for the gentlemen all had to make florid explanations to a half-crazed set of lodgers and to policemen. As for old Mrs. Hunt, she had a fainting spell, but next morning arose from her bed as well as ever.

Signor Cavagnaro relates an amusing incident of Prince Louis of Savoy's sojourn here. It has been a delicate matter, of course, to arrange the various questions of etiquette and invitation. There is no doubt that, in San Francisco's Four Hundred, there are more of the Italian colony enjoying social popularity than in any other city in this country, and, undoubtedly, the Prince will realize that the hospitality of Californians will sustain that ancient accusation that we have an "Italian climate." The Italian colony and Burlingame have divided honors so far as the Prince is reckoned. But for Cavagnaro's joke. It seems that he was a member of the Italian cortège of Princes and Counts who were entertained by the American contingent of fashion. During the afternoon there was mirth and music—it was in the country. Two thoughtless young beauties, not out of their "teens," wandered along through the parterre, and unconsciously happened by a group of the merry-makers seated in a little grove—half summer house.

"I like the Prince!" exclaimed the younger and more luscious of the two; "and, if he'd only give me one kiss. I believe I'd consent to go back to Italy as his Princess."

Signor Cavagnaro vouches for the fact that the Prince, the Count, and the other nobility were within five feet—just around the edge of the hedge.

"Here it is!" exclaimed Prince Louis gallantly, stepping forward hat in hand.

But, with a shriek and a blush, the damsel fled like a startled fawn.

Still she may claim that Leap Year gave her certain rights.

However, the Prince said the other night with the utmost naïveté, in a group of gentlemen:

"They tell me this beautiful winter weather you have now in California was saved up for me especially! The young ladies of ravishing beauty tell me this—and when they smile I believe them! Who could help it? In my voyage of the world I have never met with such strange, such cordial, or so luxurious a welcome. The memory of it should be embalmed in amber for the rest of one's life."

The Prince is also vastly taken with our horse-flesh. In and about Rome, as is well known, polo ponies are very popular. His "Excellency" has made two selections here already which will be forwarded presently.

Besides, it may interest society to know that three invitations have been given to members of the Burlingame Club to visit Italy next December.

As related at a Burlingame dinner last Sunday, the late Charles Crocker possessed ten gallons of Fin Champagne, which was imported by the French firm of Pioche et Bayereque, sometime in 1852. Mr. Crocker served it first at a grand dinner in 1880-81, and discovered that the loss by evaporation had cost him a thousand dollars on the cognac since its purchase. The guests present at the feast were actually enjoying a pousse café a piece, which was too rich for their comprehension.

Mayor Sutro, who is a stickler on wines, had an experience several years ago, when he sent his usual orders to the Rhine and the Moselle in Germany for those ripe vintages for which his cellar is famous. After a year the consignment arrived by sail and was submitted to due inspection after dinner.

"Bring a glass," said the old gentleman to his servant; "I wish to test this beautiful Tokay."

They drew the cork and handed him the goblet in the half-darkness. He drank to the full—but he did not endeavor to stay by the beverage.

It was pure salt water, for the crew had "broached" this especial portion of the cargo.

However, perhaps the most fortunate individual investment in old wines was Joe Parker's. Years ago he found himself on the gulf of bankruptcy to the extent of fifteen thousand dollars in the old Bank Exchange. In a moment of despair he resolved to sell out and go to the mines. The sale happened, and all the old imported wines and liquors of the days of the early fifties were dragged forth from the ancient cellar. It was a melancholy moment for Parker. But when, after a four hours' sale, he came out ten thousand dollars ahead of the entire game, he made disrespectful remarks about himself, and at once started a new saloon.

Regarding the recent reports which have been rife in our military and naval posts that there is a possibility of a re-occupation of Goat Island as a barracks, a host of reminiscences occur. Once upon a time it was the most attractive and—in its way—the most convenient of all the posts. It has a delightful climate, and in the latter "sixties" and early "seventies" was the favorite and fashionable picnic ground for our best society, notwithstanding its tar-weed in June and July. Large parties from San Francisco and Oakland were the guests—for the army and navy were the most sought after beaux in those days. There is a famous yarn concerning Miss Lillie Hitchcock, that divine spark of fascination, which is supposed to have been spun about that time. Seventeen bachelor officers on a "picnic tug" agreed to offer the young lady their hearts and hands successively, as an experiment. They were of the army and navy, and they were exasperated, most of them, at the inexorable disposition of the young lady to accept any marital proposals. However, their plans this time went astray. Between San Francisco, Alcatraz, Angel Island, Vallejo, Benicia, and the Goat Island picnic grounds, it is told with an air of veritability in army and navy circles that the demoiselle eccentric accepted every one of the seventeen offers from eleven in the morning until after midnight. Of course, a lot of the officers were only bluffing, and their attention was entirely without intention. For tradition has it that nine of the number were already hopelessly betrothed—especially the Vallejo contingent.

In consequence there was no picnic for various weeks, until the youthful "amber witch" had successfully laughed at those who were in real earnest and those who never meant it.

The secret of it all was that a sister of one of the officers had quietly "given the snap away."

One of our best known citizens related a rather amusing tale on the Reverend Dr. Brown at luncheon. It seems that sometime in 1893 he chanced to be on the same Western-bound overland train with the recent "clerical error." A friend brought over the latter to the narrator's seat, saying:

"I want you to meet the Reverend Dr. Brown, who has just returned from an extended vacation in the Eastern States. He is pastor of the First Congregational Church, you know."

"Ah, Doctor," replied the gentleman introduced, "you have enjoyed a splendid privilege. Of course, it has meant a complete inspection of the beautiful National Exhibition in Chicago?"

"Sir!" answered Dr. Brown, blushing with righteous indignation, "you are utterly mistaken! Do you think for a moment that a man of my cloth would visit a city and a fair which is open to the public on the Sabbath day!"

The prominent man who tells the anecdote adds: "I sized that man right up on the spot!"

A telegram from New York regarding Mrs. Henry Hilton (née Sylvia Gerrish) of California, which tells of a coachman's lawsuit, appeared in the morning papers this week, all of which reminds one of the serious disturbance in New York some years ago, when a wealthy young California magnate and a distinguished Gothamite went into Tiffany's arm in arm. One bought a christening bowl to celebrate his little niece's birth, inscribed "For the Baby." His friend threw down nine one hundred dollar bills for a ruby bracelet, to be sent to the fascinating "Melusina." By a blunder in the addresses, the gifts were mixed up—irretrievably, of course. The mother of the little niece enjoyed herself far more over the bracelet than if she had received the silver piece which reached the belle of the Casino.

The annual meeting of the Marine Underwriters was held on Wednesday, and the election of officers resulted as follows: President, L. Rosenthal; Vice-President, A. H. Small; Secretary-Treasurer, Harrison Houseworth. The election was held under new rules, which provide that all members in good standing are in nomination, voting to be by ballot. In the evening a banquet was given by the members, at which a very pleasant time was passed by a large number of guests.

A good bath gives you a new lease of life. One of the latest innovations in the Lurline Baths is a real Russian bath, which includes the famous "Needle" shower bath. The best service is given in every department at nominal charges. Fresh sea water is pumped into the tanks every night, ensuring fresh and invigorating water.

FREDERICK Warde has served his art long and well. There was a time when we denied him, but years of patient, painstaking work at last brought cordial and extensive, if not universal, recognition. Now it is not Warde whom we deny, but the very tragedies that have made the stage and developed the greatest actors that have trod its boards. It does not take a very deep thinker to realize that the tragic muse has lost her popularity, and that, year by year, the once ubiquitous Shakespearean production has dwindled into annual visits of, for the most part, mediocre itinerates. The law of supply and demand has not, in this case, profited the small and exclusive dealers in the legitimate, for that once most purveyable is no longer a staple commodity. The truth is, we need a tragedian—another Booth whose genius is transcendent—a man so luminous as to attract to him all the fugitive raw material that must be dormant somewhere in the land. It is only such an actor that can, from the present outlook, nurse back the devotion of the public. And, if he does not come, our posterity will see strange and wondrous books of Plays by William Shakespeare, emblazoned, no doubt, with the likenesses of quaint and marvelous mummers who once, in days long dead, spoke and acted those sacred lines.

Warde must have felt the foreboding of the tragedies when he revived and re-christened Belphegor, when he purchased The Lion's Mouth, and when he strove so bravely with the ill-fated Runnymede. The sexual drama had about run its course; its adherents and those of tragedy found a common meeting place in the broad and comparatively unworked field of the romantic. It was, perhaps, this popular trend, as well as the recent engagements in San Francisco of James and Keene, that induced his selection of The Mountebank and The Lion's Mouth for every night but one of the opening week at the Baldwin Theatre.

* * *

It is with luxurious content that the weary theatre-goer witnesses a performance by a company thorough enough in every detail to allow him unmolested contemplation of whatever literary excellence and artistic beauty there may be in the play. Such an organization is Frederick Warde's of this season. The company throughout is one of even excellence, handling the various roles with such an intelligent appreciation of detail, harmonious ensemble, and conscientious endeavor to tell a lucid story and present a clearly outlined picture, that one does not sigh for overwhelming genius and dazzling stars, but enjoys comfort and artistic entertainment from good plays, coherently rendered, in the hands of capable players. No man on the American stage better estimates the value or understands the manipulation of stage technic than Frederick Warde. In his modest way he has tried to do for us what Henry Irving has done for England; and, though as an actor he has not attained the crowning pinnacle of fame, he has reached an enviable and honorable position among English-speaking players. And in our present poverty of the "truly great," we owe him the deepest gratitude for having given the best years of a scholarly mind to the advancement of the sublime tragedies.

D'Ennery's romantic melodrama, The Mountebank, given on the opening night, was not well chosen to display the abilities of the company, outside of Warde's Belphegor. Belphegor we have long known as one of Warde's strongest parts. Its jaunty, reckless volatility; its terrifying grief in the second act; its pathetic entrance at the fête, and the intense, dramatic ending of the act; the pitiable bitterness of the first meeting with his wife when he finds her, jewelled and gowned, after the manner of her class—all of these diverse emotions are acted with such convincing realism and artistic subordination to the character of the lowly mountebank that the actor's creation becomes a creature real and of flesh and blood. Miss Fanny Gillette gave Madeleine a sweet, womanly rendering, gently modulated and in complete accord with the spirit of the part. Landers Stevens has developed wonderfully since this season under Warde. His voice, which was always tellingly clear and melodious, now divides the honors with an easy, graceful presence and unaffected deportment, which made the Count de Blangy a particularly felicitous task for him. Young Ernest Warde has also taken a long stride forward this season. His two strongly contrasting roles of the old Duke and Viscount Hercule were admirably sustained. Laverennes was impressively villainous, and excellently well acted by Chas. D. Herman. In fact, the entire cast, while requiring no special effort from the greater part of the company, was happily filled throughout. The scenery is the best that has been at the Baldwin for many months.

On Tuesday night Mr. Warde presented Henry Guy Carleton's The Lion's Mouth, a play so strong and so cleverly constructed that it is difficult to believe that Mr. Carleton is alive, and in America, too—but that being the case, we may still hope for the coming of the American drama. Mr. Warde, in the character of Paul di Novarra, was youthful, impetuous, ardent and manly; he avoided all temptations to be diffusely declamatory, and played the part with that consummate interblending of reserve and action that makes his work ever refreshing and artistic. Mr. Herman did a powerful piece of acting in his well-remembered role of Fra Angelo. Miss Gillette's Linora was full of life and color, displaying a rare ability for strong dramatic work that Madeleine could not reveal.

* * *

It looks like the good old days when Oshourne and Stockwell had the Alcazar to see the hustle of prosperity at the box office, large, good-natured audiences inside, and an attractive performance on the stage. The Carleton Opera Company proves to be a clever little band of singers, almost as snug and interesting in its melodious way as is the popular Frawley Company in the field of comedy-drama. Benedict's romantic Irish opera, The Lily of Killarney, has been sung this week. It is the same delightful story that Boucicault gave to the world in The Colleen Bawn, and Benedict's music echoes the true ring of Celtic sentiment and humor. Carleton's voice seems to have reached a new stratum of richness and symmetry in the part of Danny Mann, and Hamilton's rugged bass is deeply effective in Father Tom. Miss Rena Atkinson has a soprano of excellent timbre, sympathetic, liquid, and particularly strong and resonant in its upper tones. Her Eily wassung charmingly, though she did not take full advantage of its acting opportunities. Jay C. Taylor's light, etherealized tenor was admirable in Hardness Cregan, and Tom Ricketts, always reliable, made a good showing as the worthy Corrigan. All the parts were agreeably sung. The chorus and orchestra are a hit new, but a few nights more of such earnest endeavor as has characterized this week's performances, and we may expect every thing in smooth working order.

We have seen several bright specimens of the inevitable farce-comedy this season, The Widow Jones, Hendrick Hudson, Jr., and now Louis Harrison's The Bicycle Girl, which Nellie McHenry brings to the California. The latter piece is as vague of plot as either of its predecessors; it abounds in jingling song and rollicking dance that breaks in at the usual amusingly inopportune moments under the slightest pretext of a cue. Its only innovation is the ever presence of the silent steed, about which is woven its slim pretense of story bristling with an army of biking gags, many of which have long ago been discharged and pensioned by the comic weeklies. Miss McHenry is as vivacious and gingery as ever, singing several contagious little songs, and working with that jovial vim and youthfulness that each year seem to turn back the hands of the ravaging clock of time. The company is not a brilliant one, but it seems happily adapted to the fluffy character of the piece, and introduces a number of diverting specialties, among which is W. E. Richie's tramp cyclist, who is styled "Twister," and with wonderful and eccentric tricks on the wheel, he more than lives up to the name.

At Morosco's Grand Opera House Howard Taylor's The Pulse of New York, a series of thrilling melodramatic tableaux more startling than the bloodiest "nickel deadly" that ever fired the soul of a messenger boy, has been the bill of the week. The piece itself is a horror, but the stage mechanism is remarkably well handled, and the large audiences show significantly that there are thousands of people who delight in this sort of a show. Next week The Midnight Flood, which is said to offer exceptional scenic opportunity, will be presented by Darrell Vinton, Essie Tittell, and the full strength of the stock company.

The Pantzer Brothers, at the Orpheum, have been the stellar specialty this week. Their balancing act is really marvelous, even excelling that of the famous Bratz Brothers, who made such a successful record at the Orpheum last year. The balance of the programme is varied, and, for the most part, interesting to devotees of the variety.

John Philip Sousa, the March King and the most popular band master in America, will give four more of his wonderful concerts at the Auditorium this afternoon and evening, and to-morrow afternoon and evening. Besides his world-famous concert band, Miss Myrta French, soprano, and Miss Curry Duke, said to be a violinist of exceptional skill, will participate in the programmes. Classic, operatic, and popular music will be rendered by the great band, and those stirring marches of Sousa's that find the pulse of all classes and conditions of people will be heard once again, bringing happy memories of the Midwinter Exposition.

Frederick Warde is said to have made a great study during the last few years of Lear. Supported by the best legitimate company that has been here since Henry Irving, he will present King Lear to us at the Baldwin on Monday, Thursday, and Friday nights, and Saturday's matinee. Damon and Pythias will be given on Tuesday, and Julius Caesar on Saturday. Each production is to be mounted in the same lavish manner that has distinguished the opening week's performances. To-night is the only one of Virginius, in the name part of which tragedy Mr. Warde stands supreme among contemporaneous actors.

A Railroad Ticket, announced as a mechanical farce-comedy so full of snap from beginning to end that there is not a dull moment in it, will be produced at the Columbia on Monday evening by a company of merry-makers, prominent among whom are: Eugene Canfield, Jas. Bradbury, Chas. Grapewin, Harry Porter, Frank Gardiner, Kathel Kerr, Beatrice Norman, Hattie Waters, Sallie Stembler, Hulda Halvers, and Lou Rice.

Planquette's romantic opera of Rip Van Winkle will be produced at the Tivoli next week, with Hartman in his great character of Rip. Carrie Roma returned to us after an absence of two years; the two clever children, Gertie Carlisle and Pearl Landers, and all the Tivoli favorites will be in the cast. Carl Martens, formerly musical director of the Tivoli Company, will wield the baton from now on.

Anna Eva Fay, magician, who opens an engagement at the Auditorium on Tuesday evening, modestly disclaims all supernatural aid, averring that her only intention is to give an exhibition of sleight-of-hand and mind reading (for lack of a better name) that is "worth the money."

At Grover's Alcazar, next week, the Carleton Opera Company will sing Fra Diavolo on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights, and The Bohemian Girl during the balance of the week, Saturday and Sunday matinees included.

A great musical event will be the Paderewski-Marsick concert which takes place at the Baldwin to-morrow (Sunday) night.

Marsick, the great Parisian violin virtuoso, will give a recital at the California Theatre next Friday night. His programme will consist of some superb numbers and the event should prove highly interesting from a musical standpoint. Tickets are to be 50c., 75c., $1.00 and $1.50, and will be ready at the box office of the Baldwin Theatre on Monday morning. He has decided to appear at the last named theatre on Sunday night, March 8th, in a grand orchestral concert.

PATERNALISM.

ITS SUCCESSES AND FAILURES IN AUSTRALIA.—GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF RAILROADS AND ALL PUBLIC UTILITIES.

By Wm. M. Neilson.

AUSTRALIA is a country ambitious of great achievements. Her legislative and industrial undertakings have been largely of an experimental character; in executing which she has exhibited both skill and daring. With a public domain as large as that of the United States, without Alaska, with a homogeneous population possessing all the grit and go-ahead-attiveness of the Anglo-Saxon race, with untold wealth of resources in her boundless prairies, inexhaustible mines, and in the native energy of her people, and with an established credit, both at home and abroad, that was long second to none, she undertook to do things that even advanced governments elsewhere shrank from. Governmental paternalism has experienced in the Australasian States its most pronounced trial. A pure democracy, unchecked by Presidential vetoes or a conservative Senate, the people of the "sunny southern hemisphere," as they, somewhat stiltedly delight to call their Australaids, have chosen to do by and through their Government pretty nearly everything that has a community interest. Like the gold when it emanates from our mints, almost every article of consumption that is there exported, bears the Government's stamp of genuineness and fineness. The export of butter to Great Britain is assuming very large proportions, and well serves to illustrate the kind and degree of paternalism which there prevails. Every firkin of it has to bear the Government's brand before being shipped from the port of departure, and, the custom now being known and established, the butter would not find purchasers in England unless it were so branded. During the first two or three years bounties were paid, but thereafter the trade was much more than able to run alone, and within five or six years has become one not only of vast promise, but of large fulfillment. The grassy plains of the island continent being almost boundless, it follows that ultimate production may only be limited by the requirements of consumption. It is proper to say, further, that the huge cold storage steamers which carry butter, frozen meats, ripe fruits, and other perishable articles to English and European markets, are heavily subsidized by the Government, to the end that freights may be proportionately lessened to the home producer. Is there not in this a suggestion for California fruit growers, and for others who, like Mr. David Lubin, of Sacramento, believe that protection is a very excellent thing when applied all round? He would have bounties paid on grain exports, because he sees no other way of extending the beneficent advantages of protection to the farmers. Of course the argument applies no less to the fruit growers. If the Australian practice should find favor in the eyes of our statesmen and people, the same end would be accomplished in another way. That is to say, the cost of transportation would in part be paid by the Government for the benefit of the individual producer. Whatever it may be possible to say in opposition to the adoption of the practice in this country—a subject which it is not the purpose of this article to discuss—it is due to the truth of history to say that it has worked marvelously well in the case of the great ocean carrying trade between the antipodes and Europe. It has called into existence a class of huge but cheaply operated steamers that had no existence before, and it has rendered that accomplished fact which was previously believed to be impossible, namely, the exportation of perishable food products to Europe at a cost that leaves a fair margin of profit to the producer.

In watching the Australian procedure in this matter from time to time, it has been no less curious than interesting from an American standpoint, to observe how the producers there have had their eye all the time upon the exporters from our own Atlantic ports. The question ever uppermost seemed to be about like this: "What does it cost an American to ship this or that article from New York to Liverpool or London?" That ascertained, the antipodean exporter was prepared to pay about that, but not much more to the carrier. The Government subsidy was proportioned so as to make up the balance. Thus the producer 14,000 miles away from his market was, as near as possible, placed on an equal footing with the one only 3,000 away. Melbourne, Sydney and Adelaide were enabled to send their products to market as cheaply as New York, Boston and New Orleans. In all this there is a point deeply interesting to California and to our entire Pacific Coast region. It is this: If the Australian Governments find it possible, and profitable, and good in every way to equalize their producer's burdens and costs in reaching markets, why may not our own more pronouncedly protectionist Government do the same thing for the wonderful products of this far off section of our common country? That may involve the building of the Nicaragua canal, or subventions to the overland carriers, or anything else that may for the time being seem calculated to adapt means to ends—the chief end being to put this Pacific Coast in a condition to meet competition with countries laboring under disadvantages like unto our own, but which disadvantages in their case are being swept away by Governmental devices that are at least worth making a note of.

As has before been stated, paternalism is applied by the Governments of Australia to pretty nearly everything that has a community interest. Writers for the press having only encyclopædic information to guide them, are often found expressing surprise that such young countries, without standing armies, or civil strife, or foreign wars, should have piled up such comparatively enormous debts. Whilst the per capita indebtedness is undoubtedly large—too large, perhaps—it should be remembered that the Governments there stand for the indebtedness that is in this country borne by railroad, telegraph, telephone, water supply, and other corporations. Our railroads alone are computed to have an indebtedness of six billions ($6,000,000,000) of dollars. Of course it makes all the difference that the public debts of Australia were contracted for what are there called "reproductive works." Those works, except in the case of several railroads, earn fair interest and are fully worth what they cost.

This reference to railroads brings us to a larger, more important, and graver phase of paternalism, as it is practiced in Australia, than anything so far touched upon. The railroads are there built, owned, and operated by the Government. It is to the supposed success believed to be there attendant upon the management of the railroads "by, through and for the people," that advocates of Government control in this country base their chief arguments. In so far as they may justly claim that the system has worked successfully under that popular form of government, they may be right in believing that it may do equally well under ours. As the matter is now one of both local and national importance, it is of interest to inquire just how that is. The conditions are not exactly parallel, because they have in Australia a permanent and most rigid civil service system, for which this country is most certainly not prepared. Severe examination as a starter, permanency of tenure as a continuance, and a retiring pension as a finale, are conditions which prevail there, but which our spoilsmen, and frequent changes of administration, would oppose our adopting in these United States.

Of the various States, or Colonies, of the Australian group, Victoria, of which the city of Melbourne is the capital, is credited with being the first in point of importance. It has the largest population, the most fertile lands, the ablest public men, and exhibits the most public spirit. In constructive legislation it has shown much originality, ingenuity, and character. Its very excellent ballot law is favorably known to us all. Its land transfer act has been adopted in Illinois, and might with advantage be applied to the conditions existing in California. It is in Victoria that paternalism has had its most thorough trial. As we have seen, it has there had its successes, but, as will presently appear, when it came to the matter of railroad ownership and management, it utterly and hopelessly broke down and involved the country in financial embarrassment and almost ruin. When control of the railroads was first undertaken by the Government, their management was placed in the hands of a "Minister of Railways," who was a cabinet officer and a member of Parliament. It was soon discovered, however, that a political head could not wisely, economically, or even safely, manage any such department. Fare and freight charges were fixed, cheap excursion trains run, and new lines built in the interests of political support. It was determined to effect a radical change and to make the management as near as possible a one man power. A permanent board of directors, consisting of three members, removable only by a vote of both Houses of Parliament, was created and given charge of the whole subject matter. The chairman of that Board was to be an experienced railroad manager, who alone was to be held responsible for the workings of the department. His two colleagues were to act merely in an advisory capacity. The greatest care was taken to obtain the right man to fill the chief place. The large salary of $25,000 per annum that was offered proved sufficient to secure the services of one of the best known railroad men in England. Within seven years this able man (Mr. Speight), against whose personal integrity not one word has ever been uttered, had bankrupted the Government and well nigh ruined the country. Government ownership and the ultimate possibility of Parliamentary intervention proved insurmountable barriers to success. It was found impossible to eschew politics, or render economical methods paramount.

Fortunately for the interest the subject has here, the proof of all this is of record, and has come to hand at a time when it cannot fail to attract the attention of thoughtful minds. It fell to the lot of a great daily newspaper to expose railroad expenditures, and to arouse public opinion as to put an end to them and to call for some new plan of control, the chances being in favor of the leasing of the lines to an English syndicate. In an evil hour the Chief of Railroads, Mr. Speight, brought a libel suit for heavy damages against Mr. David Syme, the proprietor of the Melbourne Age, which involved the whole subject matter of railroad management. After one of the longest and most remarkable trials on record, during which more was proven than was charged, the newspaper man triumphed on all points. A banquet, attended by many of the leading men of the country, was given him on the 13th of December last, and the Melbourne Leader, of the next day, contains a report of the proceedings. They are so interesting from a journalistic, as well as a public, point of view, that the following extracts fully merit re-publication here at this time. The chairman, the Honorable J. L. Purves, A. C., who had been Mr. Syme's leading counsel, in proposing the health of the guest of the evening, gave the following resume of what had happened. He said:

"We are here to-night to celebrate a very remarkably patriotic achievement. (Applause). After years of laborious effort our guest succeeded in establishing a great newspaper in your midst. That paper is, I think, not merely at the present time at the head of all Australian journalism, but can hold its own with the journals which mould and lead public opinion in older communities. (Cheers.) In making the paper what it has become, Mr. Syme has deserted the old lines of journalism, and has taken a position that every true journalist should seek to attain—that of a popular educator. (Applause). * * The history of the administration of this country was associated, up to a certain time, with prudence, foresight, and circumspection. But there came a mad era of railroad building, public expenditures, and speculation that was almost unparalleled. Parliament was disorganized. The constituencies were demoralized and corrupted by enormous railroad expenditures. Each man in the constituencies, speaking generally, was urging upon his representative in Parliament to obtain some advantage from the general community in favor of some particular district or individual. The public service was demoralized, and Parliament, spurred on by the electorates, and by the log rolling of the members, opposed no check on borrowing and spending, and hastening to bankruptcy. The question then arose as to who was the man who could possibly oppose an effectual obstruction to this race to ruin. Mr. Syme thought the matter out, and reached the conclusion that it was his duty, irrespective of his personal fortunes and the fortunes of those who were dependent upon him, to warn the general public. (Applause). He published a series of articles which became the subject of the great trial and victory we are met to celebrate (Cheers). We never had such another series of articles presented to the public of Victoria. Never! (Applause).

They pointed out railroad expenditures, and borrowings that were utterly unjustifiable from an economical or sane point of view, and that the result to the country must be ruinous. In doing that, he necessarily attacked the heads of departments. The chief of them, a very capable enemy and a man of high attainments in many directions, initiated the great fight in which I took a part. The gentleman assumed that he was attacked by the Age, and not the system of which he was the administrator. Consequently, he commenced the action which led to the greatest trial of modern times—the greatest that was ever heard in an English Court, and by far the greatest that appears in the annals of Australia. It occupied one hundred and eighty-three days of actual Court sessions. The exhibits that were produced from the Railroad Department were so huge that they obscured entirely from view the gentleman whose business it was to number them. The defendant paid in jury fees alone £5,200. * * * When the history of this colony comes to be written, one of its finest pages will be that which describes how the community, stricken by a summer madness, was awakened to its danger by a quiet, upright, self sacrificing man, who succeeded in stirring the public up to put forth the effort required to stop vast Government expenditures for railroads, many of which began nowhere and ended at the same place, and that had brought the Government and the country to the verge of ruin. (Cheers).

Mr. Syme, in replying, said in part:

"Note what followed the publication of the alleged libels. First, the bill introduced by the Ministry of the day and supported and urged by Mr. Speight and his colleagues for the construction of 1,677 more miles of railroad, at a cost of £14,712,663 was laid aside. Secondly, a supplementary list of other lines demanded by private members, and approved by Mr. Speight and his associates, for the construction of 2,963 additional miles of railroad, at a cost of £23,362,468, was also laid aside. The whole of these lines were estimated to cost the enormous sum of £41,075,121. All this whilst the country had already been more than well supplied with railroads. The Legislature becoming alarmed at the exposures, hastily took control, through a committee of its own members, of the pending construction works, and actually effected a saving of from fifty to seventy-five per cent upon the department's estimate of cost. The running of the existing lines was reduced from an annual cost of £2,138,139 to £1,543,393, or an annual saving of no less than £594,746, and it has become plain that much more can be done in the same direction. The loss on the working of the existing lines is still £1,000 per day. And yet the department would go on making new lines, and working them on the old model, notwithstanding that thirty-three lines do not pay working expenses, and thirteen other lines do not pay interest on their construction. Even the outer circle line, the department had promised to operate, although it has been closed for nearly three years, because there was absolutely no traffic. Every witness had deplored political influences in our State railroads, but what was to be done whilst the taxpayers of one locality were not put upon an equal footing, in the matter of railroad accommodation with the taxpayers of every other locality? But the question of railroad reform is now understood, and is ripe for settlement. If a safe solution be reached, I shall have had my reward. (Cheers).

All of that makes interesting reading here and now. It is clear that those among us who had hoped to find in Government control of railroads a panacea for existing ills will take little comfort from the practical working of the system in Australia.

The Alina Colony Scheme.

It does seem that California is to be eternally cursed by the malignant operations of promoters abroad. No sooner does one miserable scheme disappear, than another of the hydra-headed species crops up to throw a damper upon all efforts to secure foreign capital for the development of the vast resources of a State which in many different ways, offers unsurpassed opportunities for the advantageous and profitable investment of many millions of idle money. The latest proposition of a kind which cannot be too strongly condemned has just been brought out in London as the Alina Colony Corporation, Limited, to dispose of 20,000 acres of unimproved land in Merced County. For the privilege of ownership the investors are asked to plank up £400,000, or in round numbers $2,000,000. Of this amount the sum of $1,500,000 is to be paid to the vendor, whoever he may be. The prospectus is made up mostly of statistics showing what has been done in the way of fruit raising in California, but we fail to find any reference to the years which must elapse before the trees or vines come into profitable bearing. While no one will deny that Merced is one of the most desirable locations for fruit culture, it will be safe to refer to any fair-minded and disinterested man in the county for his opinion on the Alina scheme. The foreign investor in this case is getting bled in the purchase of the ground, preparatory to a grievous disappointment in the way of rapid returns upon an investment heavily handicapped by an extravagant property valuation at the start.

A Trap Set For Gudgeons.

People desirous of entering into the fruit-raising, fruit-preserving, dried or canned, could do much better by picking up improved lands in Merced, where an already profitable business could be largely increased by the addition of capital. It is in this direction that a "going concern" can be recommended which would not be the case, nine times out of ten, in a mining enterprise. We do not know who is responsible for the Alina scheme, but we do know that were they to attempt such a scheme here they would be out of pocket for their pains. They were wise in their generation to play the game abroad, where a showy statement, backed by apparently reliable official statistics, with really no bearing on the case with the well-informed, is certain to attract a few gudgeons. It will be hoped, however, that the majority of people will bave cut their wisdom teeth by this time in the matter of investments from this quarter, so as to be able to sift the wheat from the chaff. The cunning manner in which the "State Board of Horticulture of the State of California" is paraded for effect, is common with the compilers of prospectuses of the kind, but we would like to know whether this honorable body, whose name is thus taken in vain, would recommend any one to pay any such price for an unimproved acreage of the kind in Merced, or any other county of the State, for that matter. It might be added that the only San Francisco bank standing sponsor for the Alina scheme is the Grangers', now in liquidation, which suspended just about the time the company was being arranged in London. One thing is certain, if the Directors of the Grangers' Bank made their loans upon any such a basis of valuation as that placed upon the lands now offered to the British investors under the auspices of the Alina, it is not strange that they had to close their doors, and the only wonder is that the concern managed to keep alive so long.

Candelaria Mining Interests.

Colonel W. J. Sutherland, President of the Holmes Mine, of Candelaria, Nev., reports all work nearing completion in connection with the arrangements now being made to work the large piles of tailings on the Belleville dumps. When operations commence in this quarter it will help to build up the population of this camp again, which has dwindled down to almost nothing during the past five years. The English company, under the Sutherland management, has rebuilt its entire pipe line from the White Mountain reservoirs to Candelaria, and its mills and plant generally are in excellent condition.

The Hexter Gold Mine.

In relation to the criticism of the Hexter Mine of Calaveras County, the management places the enterprise in a totally different light by the explanation that the Hamilton named as a Director is not the one of Union-Gold, Mulatos notoriety. The gentleman whose initials were wrongly quoted is Mr. Claude T. Hamilton, a young merchant of this city of the highest repute. We are now ready to believe anything good which may be said of the Hexter, and to take a kindly interest in the future of the property, the more especially as the report was made upon it by W. T. Robinson, a mining Superintendent of vast experience upon this section of the "mother lode." It is claimed for the Hexter that, covering as it does over a mile of this celebrated mineral deposit, it has a wider field for operations than any other company ever yet incorporated in California. That under the management of such competent men as those included in the directory it will prove a lucrative investment of the first order is within the bounds of probability. It cannot be gainsaid that the past history of the ground points to the happy fulfillment of the most sanguine expectations in this case, as the fact cannot be denied that the surface workings in placer formation proved inordinately rich. It was from the data obtainable of the returns from these early workings, based on the area of gravel now available for explorations, that the possible output of the future was estimated in the millions. But irrespective of all this, the development of the quartz deposit is what will most interest people, as work is now about to be started up in a systematic manner, both by tunnel and by the extension of the shaft at depth. With such a vast territory at their command the Hexter people will have an unlimited opportunity for testing the resources of the greatest mineral lode on earth at this point. The operation, directed as it is by reputable and judicious people, can with safety be commended as a worthy investment for capital. On the other hand, we should not hesitate to take an exactly opposite view of the case with the circumstances as at first suggested, and another Union Gold fiasco looming up in the future like a hideous nightmare.

Retires Amid Regrets.

The London papers continue to express their regrets at the retirement of Colonel Frank McLaughlin from the management of the Feather river mines. The Financial News, in a recent issue says: "It is with no little sadness that we observe the news that Colonel Frank McLaughlin has resigned his position as General Manager of the Golden Gate of California. The Colonel has been for many years the most picturesque figure in the wide sphere of British gold mining enterprise abroad. There may be those who prefer to let their admiring eyes rest on the millionaires of South Africa, but their careers of smooth prosperity are uninteresting compared with Colonel McLaughlin's long struggle with the storms of Oroville." And so on through the adulatory paragraph, which winds up with the kindly wish that it will be long until the genial mining man reaches the final Golden Gate, a wish which his many friends here and on the Pacific Slope will heartily re-echo. Colonel McLaughlin, who was in town for a few days past, left on Wednesday for a trip to Oroville on some business matters. Mr. George H. Evans is now in full control as general manager of the English company's works on the Feather, and hopeful that the elements will this year favor an early opening of operations on the roadbed.

Comstock Mining Shares.

The market on Pine street is gradually sagging down to a bed-rock which threatens to be as low as that struck prior to the last rampse in 1885. There is no reason to assign for this except that there is no head to the market, all the big operators having been driven out by a dread of litigation started by the bawks of the street, always on the look out to jump on a rich man's sack at the first opportunity. This is about the sum and substance of the whole business, and the outlook is anything but bright, so far as the speculative features are concerned. There is a contest on foot for control of Norcross, but as there is no money being spent, or likely to be spent, by either part, interest in the proceedings flags. There is not any likelihood of there being any change in the control outside of a small representation of the outside interests.

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

PRESIDENT Jordan is good enough to say that there is more intellect to the square inch of skull in the faculty of the State University than in California's delegation to both houses of Congress. Presumably, his flattering estimate of the mental capacity of the Berkeley educators is founded on the fact that they seemed to listen with understanding to Josiah Royce when that young man recently journeyed all the way from Harvard to California to disclose what he thought about his Maker. As it is quite certain that no member of Congress, from California or elsewhere, could possibly have comprehended the exact meaning of Professor Royce's revelations, President Jordan's high opinion of Berkeley's brain power is justified—that is, unless the crafty old gentlemen in the employ of the State didn't merely look intelligent, instead of being so. But Dr. Jordan is entitled to his conviction. The Royce test is undoubtedly a corker.

THE resources of civilization ought to be equal to restoring peace to the local Christian world. The TOWN CRIER suggests that Brother Ross invite Brother Hudleson, Brother Wendte and the rest to seats with him on the platform at the Mechanics' Pavilion. Then let Father Yorke cut out of the subjugated daily papers all the matter he has written during the past two months, make it into bales with the help of a hay press, get aid to hoist the same to the gallery of the Pavilion, and at some favorable moment roll the bales over the railing onto the heads of his foes. That would dispose of the leaders of the A. P. A., and the infuriated rank and file could then be depended on to smash Father Yorke's pen hand, and so disable him for a few hours. During those few hours the remainder of the community would be given the quiet necessary to think up some scheme for ending the war.

FROM the manner in which the Examiner is booming Chinatown, it is inferred that a removal of the office thither is in contemplation. It urges the transplantation of its lady friends of Morton street to Cum Cook alley, and, with an eye to the increase of property values in its new neighborhood, artfully argues that "as long as we have a Chinatown we may as well get some benefit from it by utilizing it as the city's moral dumping ground." Environment, as every student of sociology is aware, has much to do with character, and, if the voteless Chinese are not to be considered, the rise of a grand new Examiner building on, say, the corner of Dupont and Pacific, would be viewed with profound moral satisfaction by the Mothers of San Francisco.

THE Old Guard and the Junta have both held their primaries. The battle may be expected to open with the Devil and Chris Buckley, sitting on the cloud of their common interests, to direct the conflict. Where the Democratic party is to arrive at is a small detail that does not seem to worry the hostile forces or their tall-browed chiefs.

THINGS are looking brighter for Dr. Brown. Mrs. Stockton admitted that they never went to the theatre, and testified that he drank no wine at dinner. If now it shall be established that Brother Brown has eschewed the billiard table all will be well with him.

AT a recent dinner given by the Princeling of Savoy the other guests, including many Americans, stood while he delivered his speech. It would be in strict keeping with our republican institutions had they kissed his hand before leaving.

IT is safe to state that the epidemic of murders at present prevalent in this city will continue until there is a reasonable chance of convicting and hanging the men and women who commit them.

THE good Dr. Dille, feeling it was time that somebody competent for the task should rise and perform it, took from his pulpit on Sunday last a survey of the moral situation in sinful San Francisco. The good Dr. Dille finds that what we need to do at this crisis is to stop playing progressive euchre, stop playing baseball and football, and on no account to dance or go to the theatre. It is a hard programme which the good Dr. Dille has marked out for us, but, as he is a wisely liberal shepherd, it is to be presumed that, after we have sedulously abstained from all the master vices of the age mentioned, he will permit a little healthful recreation—say listening to a sermon by the Reverend Dr. Brown, or taking (not on the Sabbath, of course) a stroll with Mrs. Stockton.

DR. CASE is very sure
That the city is impure—
A sort of moral pesthouse, don't you know;
I meekly would remark
That the town were not so dark

IN the near future the California Dairy Association intends giving a series of lectures on subjects interesting to dairymen. Needless to say the pump will receive much attention, as also the available water supply of San Francisco; also, a few remarks on the availability of hydrants and the water tower should the same ever be necessary.

WHY all this fuss about dodging the wily Assessor, gentlemen? Verily, the mau who has coin nowadays does not wish to be taxed for it, as though it were a sin. If wealth be a virtue it should be let alone, and if it be a vice the more of it that is sent out of the State the better.

NOW that the Examiner is admitting letters from professional tramps to its columns, there is every possible chance of a marked improvement of tone in its columns.

NOT to be connected with any church organization is to-day almost as good as a certificate of good character.

THE last thing Dr. Brown is said to have lost was his temper. The next thing to go may be his character.

neither ayes nor noes would carry the day, but surely the P's would have it. What with the Prince and the Pianist, there has been little else thought of or talked of in the swim's select circles. The Italian Prince has hobnobbed with the Polish princeling, been fêted by day by the Burlingamites and at night by his countrymen, and on all sides has won golden opinions from all sorts of people. To be sure, in the feminine mind the musical P. has the top place. Women love genius, and above all, femininity is piqued by an unapproachable man; and the desire to meet the gifted Polish musician grew to such a height among a certain set, rumor said several of the most venturesome hid them "for a few days' rest" to San Mateo in the early part of the week, and were to be seen from morn till dewy eve prowling around Jack Parrott's abode during the visit paid him by the maestro.

Now that Leut is with us our maids and matrons are full of projects as to how to spend the enforced quietude. Some have organized parties for early walks; others, card clubs. Some, like the revived Fortnightlies, for example, are more daring, and blend their programme with music, pictures and plays. A few who do not belong to the Lent-keeping sects still dance on occasions, but they are in the great minority, not being "fashionable" people. Some women go daily to church, and in the evening to some form of diversion.

Shall Del Monte or San Mateo be fashion's objective point this year, is the question being mooted by anxious mamas. Some say Coronado is a rich field to prospect, so many wealthy Easterners going there. San Rafael has got a black eye from the gossip dowagers who frequent the place, and of whose tongues the girls are mortally in fear. One old lady, the girls say, keeps a record of how many times they go out with one man, how long they remain, etc., and that sort of thing is intolerable, of course.

They say Ed. Greenway has employed the retirement caused by his recent illness in devising the most startlingly original figures for the next series of cotillions, and the Burlingame Club is to donate the favors for some. Should this be so, many will win their spurs for the first time on the occasion of the dance. Poor Wilcox, who has been among the sick (and wounded, says Cupid) and thereby missed so much gaiety, will emerge once more at the Easter cotillion at the Post.

The gossip of the swim goes that the tall young matron who adopted the original attire at the Art bal masqué was so delighted with the complimentary notices she received in all the papers, that she is trying to induce her fashionable friends to join in a subscription Easter masquerade to be given by the younger set of married women at some hall or other. The idea is being very favorably considered in the swim.

The recent successful entertainment of Living Pictures given at Mrs. Clark Crocker's residence for charity has fired the ambition of several society beaux, and, it is said, a repetition of the affair may be given by these gentlemen ere long, with a different cast. For instance, Turner Messersmith is to pose in "The Lady and the Muff."

"I tell you what it is," said a well-known Brownie, the other evening, "most fellows like to be master in their own house, but I'm hanged if I wouldn't just love to have a Boss in mine," and he looked languishingly in the direction of a charming blonde maiden near by.

They say a popular young millionaire spends much of his time in San Rafael these days.

Prince Paderewski and Prince Luigi of Savoy have said farewell in a blaze of glory and banquets. At the great musician's dinner the other night, Grieg's exquisite "Ich liebe dich!" was sung by Donald deV. Graham to the exquisite accompaniment of the Master—and Graham was not at all nervous.

The wonder is great among Gothamites that our belles do not try the capture of Fred Crocker, but they do not know, evidently, that the net has been thrown many a time and oft, the wily Colonel shying off at each endeavor.

On dit, our own Donald is having a busy time since he opened his vocal studio. So many would-be singers apply to have their voices tried! However, that is a necessary phase of his chosen career, and he must not complain.

People are wondering what will be the next social sensation when the Prince and the Italian frigate leave our shores.

After dinner try Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum. You will find it admirable.

The Change of Taste.

Whiskey and Soda has supplanted in England the Brandy and Soda of the old regime. Consequently, the demand for a good, sound, pure American Whiskey has been large, and it has been most satisfactorily filled by "Old Saratoga," a pure Rye Whiskey, which has no peer in this or any other country. The consumption in England is growing at an enormous rate, and all the principal hotels of London keep it and recommend it to their patrons.

THE gay season ended last night with a dance at Sherry's, given by the society popularly called the Howling Swells—which is composed of the noble rich almost entirely. The cotillion lasted well on into the morning hours, and there were many beautiful favors and mirth unbounded. The last charity entertainment of importance was also held at Sherry's for the benefit of the Samaritan Home, an asylum for the aged, which is a pet charity of New York. Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs has identified herself with this charity ever since her first year in New York, and last year had a distinct innovation at her stall when she put a little pony on sale, and made a very good sale of him, too, it may be added.

The reception on Monday at the Post Graduate Hospital was probably the most interesting of all the recent affairs of like nature, for it was entirely a babies' reception. The babies' wards in this hospital have been fitted up by wealthy patrons, and the dainty cribs, with their pretty draperies, are things of beauty. Every appointment is suggestive of a home and not of a hospital. The principal interest of the visitors seemed centered in the incubators, which are an unending source of wonder.

The close of the opera season and the departure of some of the chief dramatic stars, indicate still further the season of penance. Madame Bernhardt, who has been extensively entertained by exclusive society, as well as by her friends of upper Bohemia, was given a reception on Monday by Mr. Francis Fischer Powers at his studio in the Carnegie Building. Among the ladies receiving for him was Miss Quigley, a clever young Californian, who is known in journalism as Dorothy Q., and in literature through some most delightful fairy tales, equally pleasing to old and young. There were several Californians present, Colonel and Mrs. Savage, Mrs. Sonntag, Mrs. Bella Nichols, Miss Ferrer, and Miss Frances Jolliffe. This last named young lady, by the way, is spoken of as a most promising aspirant for dramatic honors. I understand that Augustin Daly has expressed his approval of her style and methods, which is almost equivalent to saying that she may have an opening in his company. She is a very gifted young woman, and apparently ambitious.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Gillig have been oscillating between New York and Larchmont for the last ten days. They are building a large addition to the Hacienda, their beautiful country home, and expect to entertain largely this summer. Madame Saville, née Simonson, of San Francisco, has been an immense favorite during the opera season. Am I wrong in thinking she once sang at the Tivoli Opera House in your city?

Miss Olive Oliver, who is in the Holland Company, playing a leading part in the Social Highwayman, expects to go to California in the summer and will visit her mother in Oakland.

To return to Madame Bernhardt, I have been told that one of your brilliant society matrons entertained her at a breakfast during her last season in San Francisco society, and was assailed by your whole four hundred, to say nothing of certain refined dailies in San Francisco, for having done homage to the great artist. It may be a solace to her to know that the very best people of New York have been delighted to honor Madame Bernhardt, who has been received and has mingled with the representatives of old New York society in a genial friendliness which many of Mrs. Crocker's critics would give their heads to enjoy. We are not yet so narrow that genius fails of recognition among us.

what is milk

The most perfect food in the world is milk. Nature has provided that the youngest and most tender child shall have this food. In milk there is a generous supply of oil, or fat. This exists in the form of minute globules, or tiny drops. They are so small that it takes hours for them to rise to the surface, as cream. We say, "milk is an emulsion," because the oil is in this finely divided condition.

Scott's Emulsion

of Cod-liver Oil with the hypophosphites, has the cod-liver oil in these fine globules, thus making it an emulsion. Boys and girls, as well as delicate invalids, can take cod-liver oil when prepared in this manner. In fact, it is well adapted to young children. The hypophosphites give strength to the nervous system and needed material to growing bone. Learn from nature: take cod-liver oil only as an emulsion.

"KAIRON GNOTHI."

The Secret in Making Money is in this Old Greek Proverb.—It Means "Know Your Opportunity."—Some of the Men Who Made Millions by Knowing How.—Very Valuable Information.

WHEN Commodore Vanderbilt was asked how he made his great fortune of $90,000,000, he replied: "It was an easy matter to become rich; just watch for the opportunity, and then take advantage of it," said he. "I commenced with only a few hundred dollars." But there are many people who cannot recognize the opportunity to make money. They may have a little sum to invest but are not in a position to know what is going on.

It is a well-known fact that Commodore Vanderbilt made most of his fortune by buying stocks at a low price, and holding on until they had an immenso rise. He had the peculiar gift of knowing just when to buy and when to sell. Other men have made great fortunes in stocks of one kind or another, among them being John W. Mackay, the Rockefeller, and Jay Gould. They all started with small sums.

Among the stocks that have been sensational in their development is the Bell Telephone stock, rising from a very low price to over 200. This stock has paid large dividends and made the original investors rich.

Ten Millions a Year.

The Western Union Telegraph Company started business with $500,000 of capital stock. Its present capital stock is $100,000,000, and pay $5,000,000 a year net profits to the stockholders.

There are many other high-priced stocks that cost original buyers a very low price, and now pay large dividends on many millions of capital stock.

The Edison Electric is another notable example of wonderful development and profit. A broker who bought twenty shares of the original stock at 45, costing $900, sold half of it a year later, getting $30,000 for 10 shares.

The Pullman Palace Car Company's gross earnings have grown until they are over $10,000,000 a year and the stock has gone up from a low price to 180.

There are many chances for making investments, but there are none like the Railway and Dock Construction stock and many prominent men in banking, railroad and financial circles say this stock, which can be bought now at $10 per share, is sure to sell at 50 before long, and eventually have an immense rise like the Bell Telephone, the Edison Electric and Pullman Palace Car stocks.

The par value is $100 per share and the stock is full paid and non-assessable. The stockholders have no individual liability whatever.

Mr. Edward A. Willson, the well-known Vanderbilt stockbroker, says: "In our twenty years experience we have never handled a stock of such intrinsic merit or one which will pay such big profits. This stock gives the small investor an equal chance with the capitalist, as the small investor generally has to buy at par and be content with a dividend of 6 or 7 per cent. a year. Any one can invest in Railway and Dock Construction stock now at $10 per share (the par value is $100) and they can buy from one share upwards at the same price a capitalist buys a thousand shares. The stock is certain to have an immense rise when investors and speculators become aware of its great value as the earnings will pay four and a half per cent. on the par value of the shares, which equals 45 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at the low price of $10 per share.

Surely this is an opportunity which is met with but once in a life-time.

There will be lively times in this stock when it is listed on the Stock Exchange. We deal in numerous bonds that pay from 4 to 5 per cent. a year. We are so confident of the profits that will accompany investment in this stock that we have not the slightest hesitation advising our clients to sell their bonds and invest in Railway and Dock stock while they can buy it at 10. The company is in solid financial condition, has no indebtedness of any kind, and there are no bonds or mortgages ahead of the stock.

The company owns all the rights, titles, interests in, and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell indestructible piles under U. S. patents. The best engineering talent of the world has heretofore been unable to produce a pile that is absolutely indestructible. Many costly experiments have been tried to make wooden piles impervious against decay and the ravages of marine worms, but the wooden piles only last from six months to a few years, requiring continual replacement at great expense.

Certainty of Profit.

There is an enormous demand for indestructible piles in the construction of piers, jetties, docks, bulkheads, breakwaters, foundations for bridge piers, etc.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are, perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. 3000 miles are now being graded or are under contract; the great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s patent pile in solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Many negotiations now pending will create an immense demand for the stock and cause it to sell at a very high figure.

Prominent bankers say: "The public ought to buy this stock now before the price goes up, for, by securing some of the stock now at 10, they can share in the great profits of development and will more than quadruple their capital very soon as the above are only a few of the many sources of earnings that will cause Railway and Dock Construction stock to rise to a high price.

The very moderate estimate of earnings pays 45 per cent. dividend on stock costing only $10 per share without counting in any profits on contracts with the U. S. Government or New York City. When any of these contracts are closed the stock will sell above $100 a share very quickly.

There will be spent by the City of New York in reconstructing a small part of the city water front about $3,000,000 per year for many years to come. In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, Ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

Old Style—New Style.

In place of the old wooden docks covered by temporary sheds which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

New York City's revenue will be greatly enlarged by this vast increase of taxable property on these new piers.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance to the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $4,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston; they are simply loose rock dumped in the water, forming a pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet at the top above the water. Each jetty is about 4½ miles long. The Railway and Dock Construction Co. build indestructible jetties of same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

In addition to all these immense profits the plans of the R. & D. C. Co. call for an expenditure of about $10,000,000 to deepen the channel at Sandy Hook. The U. S. Government can well afford to spend this sum to benefit the vast commercial interests of the port of New York.

Even Bear Speculators Buy.

Not only the bulls but even the very best judges of values, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, are buying this particular stock now—they are aware of its solid intrinsic merit and magnificent future and confidently predict that this one deal alone will put R. & D. C. stock up to $250 a share—and other large contracts will follow.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction must come into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

Powerful influences that will push this project in Congress will cause an active, booming speculation in the stock; an influential lobby and important railway, banking and political interests are in line for this purpose.

Investors can buy the stock at $10 per share, in lots to suit, from the financial agents of the Company, Messrs. Geo. W. Dunn & Co., Bankers, 2 Wall Street, New York. Non-residents can remit to them for the shares by check, draft, money order, registered letter, or by express, or have the stock certificate sent by express C. O. D.

The price will be advanced shortly.

The officials and large stockholders are well-known practical financiers and business men, whose names are at once a synonym for trustworthy, capable management and a guarantee that any stock in which they invest is safe, solid and very profitable. Among them are George W. Dunn, Esq., President of the company, head of the banking house of Geo. W. Dunn & Co., New York, and president, director and trustee of other corporations; he has been prominent in Wall Street for 25 years as a careful, level-headed financier; Hon. Thomas Murphy, ex-Senator, the famous Collector of the port of New York under President U. S. Grant; the eminent lawyer R. A. B. Dayton, Esq., Counsel of the company, 322 Broadway, New York; Eugene Harvey Esq., banker, Drexel Building, Philadelphia, Pa.; R. M. Stanbrough, Esq., capitalist, West Hurley, N. Y.; Geo. D. Hilyard, Esq., contractor, New York; W. A. Childs, Esq., of the Calumet and Hecla Copper Co., Calumet, Mich.; Edward A. Willson, Esq., broker, New York; Geo. B. Shellhorn, Esq., Receiver Montgomery, Tuscaloosa and Memphis Railway Co., Montgomery, Ala.; Y. Carryer, Esq., of the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company, Field, B. C., Canada; Howard Swineford, Esq., of Howard Swineford & Co., Richmond, Va.; W. M. Shipp, Esq., cashier of Deposit Bank, Midway, Ky.; Jacob Deyo, cashier Huguenot Bank, New Paltz, N. Y.; C. E. Harwood, Esq., cashier Rockville National Bank, Rockville, Conn., and other prominent gentlemen.

The Railway and Dock Construction Company has an absolute monopoly and its earnings will increase with the steady growth of commerce and of railroads.

DEAR EDITH:—The girls are all talking about their spring suits already. Cheviots, I understand, will still be stylish, browns and grays being the favorite colors. The new fancy, Persian velvet, is just the thing for trimming your spring gown with. It comes in all sorts of colors and is much less expensive than real velvet, although it looks just as well and lasts better. Big buttons will still be used. I thought they would die out with the winter, but Dame Fashion says no. The smoked pearl and macre effects will be chiefly used as also the steel and horn and cloth covered ones. Fetching little dinner dresses can be made out of different-hued challis, fixed up with lace and ribbons.

Very few gowns are made without some sort of Persian trimming. It may be an entire Persian velvet or silk waist without the sleeves, it may only be the sleeves, or again it may only appear in the collars or cuffs, but it is always somewhere.

The cuffs of this season are of all shapes and sizes and individual taste is allowed to run riot in choosing colors for them.

Another pretty fashion is being revived again and that is the bertha, or lace flounce, which is being extensively used on evening gowns. Point d'Alencon and even a dozen yards of five-inch edge of the same pattern make an exquisite bertha. Irish poplins are also being used for evening dresses, especially in cream, ivory, tan and gold colors.

I saw a lovely evening costume at the Basset's reception last Wednesday. It consisted of a rich bengaline in a delicate tone of yellow, with a corsage adorned with bretelles en cascades of fine old Mechlin lace, set off with bows of tomato red velvet; the same garniture was worn on the jupe, forming a cascaded sash on each side of front, the right one being much shorter than the left, and each end was held in place by a touch of the velvet. I told you last week how rich velvets were being worn. The effect they produce is handsome in the extreme.

Alpacas of light colors and heavier mohairs will also be used from now on. Grass linen, Holland, and ecru tatiste also stay in favor. Foulards and those so-called India silks are not much liked although manufacturers are trying to place them on the market again.

The fashionable silk will be the crisp taffetas, their stiffness making them in keeping with present styles. For summer, checked silks will be used and I hear that turquoise blue is going to be the favorite color for all light dresses.

Lenten gowns are made of French broadcloth in browns, blues, greens, and violets and, now and again, of superb "eminence" purple. It is not every woman that can wear it, though. The effect is all right for women of the red type. The trimmings for such goods are chiefly bodice decorations of white satin, spangled in jet or gold or embroidered in elaborate threads. White dressed kid, worked with colored silk and shaped into vests, revers, collars, and cuffs, is seen on a few of the handsomer gowns.

The use of velvet has made some sort of preparation necessary for cleaning it. A Paris journal states that it should always be brushed against the grain to remove the dust and, if in a very bad condition, should be sprinkled with fine white sand and then brushed till none of this remains. The cleansing power of common seashore sand is very great, and if collected after use and washed, can be made to do service many times.

Hats are being worn well tilted over the eyes and the hair must have a more fluffy and uncombed appearance than ever to give the required breadth below. The prettiest veiling I have seen for some time is a new goods from Paris with a large chenille dot and looks exceedingly pretty.

THE LITTLE GRAVE.—ERIC MACRAY.

A LITTLE mound of earth
Is all the land I own:
Death gave it me,—five feet by three,
And marked it with a stone.

My home, my garden grave,
Where most I long to go!
The ground is mine by right divine,
And Heaven will have it so.

For here my darling sleeps,
Unseen,—arrayed in white,—
And o'er the grass the breezes pass,
And stars look down at night.

Here Beauty, Love and Joy,
With her in silence dwell,
As Eastern slaves are thrown in graves
Of kings remembered well.

But here let no man come,
My mourning rights to sever,
Who lieth here is cold and dumb.
Her dust is mine forever!

A LIFE LESSON.—JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY.

There! little girl; don't cry!
They have broken your doll, I know;
And your tea set blue
And your playhouse, too;
Are things of the long ago;
But childish troubles will soon pass by,
There! little girl; don't cry!

There! little girl; don't cry!
They have broken your slate, I know;
And the glad wild ways
Of your school-girl days
Are things of the long ago;
But life and love will soon come by,
There! little girl; don't cry!

There! little girl; don't cry!
They have broken your heart, I know;
And the rainbow gleams
Of your youthful dreams
Are things of the long ago;
But heaven holds all for which you sigh,
There! little girl; don't cry!

A SPRING SONG.—CLARA GRANT DUFF, IN PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

The spring has come again, with its sudden showers of rain,
And the golden glint of sunlight in between,
And the murmur of the bees, and the whisper of the trees,
And the bursting of shy buds of tender green.
And every where is heard the call of bird to bird,
From the sundawn till comes down the twilight clear.
It is joyous, buoyant spring, such as poets ever sing,
Such as was, and is, and shall be—every year.

But for you and me, my sweet, is the joy no more complete?
We have left behind the springtime of our days,
Though the years are yet untold in which men will call us old;
Though we wander in sunny upland ways,
By a strange and mystic spell that upon our spirits fell,
On the day life seemed to touch the point sublime.
Love, shall we ever know what has changed the sunlight so,
What has stamped Life with the greyer hue of Time?

COMPENSATION.—S. D. S. JR.

My brow upheld a crown of high success,
Riches were mine, I was at manhood's prime;
Boldly I sought her presence to confess
My heart's desire. I thought, "'tis now the time."
Lo! I was humbled, and I went my way
Bitter at heart for that she said me nay.

Poor and dishonored, weighted with my years—
Time's only gift—unfriended and alone,
I passed her by and shrank away with tears,
So sharp my pain at sight of her had grown.

"Look up," she said; "now is thy suffering o'er.
I loved thee always: we shall part no more."

Tenderfoot—What made Bill kill him? PIZENWOOD PETE—Well, yer see, Bill was drunk. TENDERFOOT—But there must have been some provocation? PIZENWOOD PETE—I sh'd say so; the galoot was telling Bill a good thing to sober up on.

Biggs—I am so stout that I know exercise would do me a lot of good. TAMS—Then why don't you get out and shovel that snow off the walk? BIGGS—That's not exercise; that's work.—Truth.

She—And you really attended the Queen's reception in London? The men, I suppose, stand uncovered in the presence of royalty? "Yes, but not to the same extent as the women."—Life.

Old Lady—Can you saw wood? ROLLINGSTONE—Pardon me, ma'am, but you are slightly at fault in your tenses. If you mean, can I see wood, I may say that my eyesight is slightly defective.

Mr. Upperten—I'm going to bring a friend of mine home to dinner to-morrow. He says he was once married to you. MRS. UPPERTEN.—How delightful! I wonder who he can be?

"How is your daughter getting on with the piano, Numson?" "First-rate. She can play with both hands now. She says she will be able to play with her ear in six months."

Alice—What is Jack's occupation? LUCY—He is a consulting engineer. ALICE—I see. If he should get any business he would consult another engineer.—Puck.

Burleigh—Didn't you say Miss Uptodate was very manly. CURLEIGH—Yes. Why? BURLEIGH—I saw her last night and she was just as near a man as she could be.

Judge—Are you married? PRISONER—No, your Honor, I wanted to get married several times, but I have been locked up so much I never was able to find time.

"They say Alfred Austin is only about five feet two. No wonder he can't fill Tennyson's shoes!" "O, but he can, you know. His feet are monstrous."

"Have you been reading about these dressmaking frauds?" "Where?" "In the papers." "No, but I have read my wife's last milliner's bill."

"Young man," said the merchant to the prospective office boy, "are you fairly well educated?" "I be," replied the boy proudly.—Judge.

"Really, Mr. Stalate," she said, "I am afraid you will not make a wife happy." "Why not?" "You don't seem at all fond of your home."

Strawber (in cable car)—What makes you think that man opposite is an official of the road? SINGERLY—Didn't the car stop to let him on?

The World, The Flesh and the Devil

THE Russian General Dragomiroff, happening to be present at the recent French military manoeuvres, requested the officer in command to load his cannon with percussion shells instead of blank. When this had been done he stated his intention of placing himself between the guns and the place at which they were aimed. The officers, greatly astonished, pointed out the danger of this undertaking, but the General laughed at their fears. Then, accompanied by an attaché, he galloped some distance in front of the cannon and gave the order to fire. This was done after much hesitation. The shells passed near the General and his companion, but did not hurt them. Afterwards he told the officers that he merely wished to show them how little danger there was in standing in the direct line of fire.

—Jabez Balfour, the London "Liberator" swindler who is serving a fourteen year sentence, was professedly a man of deep religious convictions. He belonged to a political club, the members of which once got up a sweepstake on the Derby. One of the gentlemen playing happened to be a Balfour, and when Jabez heard of the affair he requested the committee to print the other man's initials, so that no mistake could possibly occur. A few weeks afterward he was flying to the Argentine Republic, a fugitive from justice. His swindling is said to have been the cause of one hundred suicides.

—The love of the late Lord Leighton for his art and everything connected with it is shown by his last words—"My love to all at the Academy." His loss is said to be irreparable. As President of the Royal Academy he carried out the business of the institution with precision and was careful of its smallest detail. His lectures were masterly in form, and the knowledge they displayed and his generosity were unbounded.

—Anatole France, the mau who will fill the place in the French Academy left vacant by the death of Ferdinand de Lesseps, is fifty-one years of age. He is best known to Americans as the author of "The Crime of Sylvester Bonnard," a translation of which appeared in Harper's. He writes on an average one book a year.

—The other day a well-known London author was about to receive an unusually large sum for the copyright of a new novel. Twenty-four hours after the publication of the paragraph he was pounced upon by the surveyor of taxes and requested to make an amended return of his income.

—The hereditary Prince of Armenia, Guy de Lusignan, lives in Paris in simple style. He is a book lover, and is devoted to music and art, and is the author of over fifty volumes. In build he is slender and graceful, his features are of patrician delicacy, and his hair is snow white.

—President Paul Kruger, who will shortly visit England, is of royal Swedish descent. His genealogical tree is by way of the royal family of Vasa, through Christina, Queen of Sweden, daughter of the great Gustavus Adolphus. His salary is $40,000 per annum.

—Madame Patti says that no singer should indulge in alcoholic stimulants of any kind, as they irritate the throat. If alcoholic stimulants must be taken, then whiskey strongly diluted with water, is what may be taken with least fear of injury to the throat.

—The old and faithful servant of Charles Dickens, Mrs. Cornelius, died in London last month, aged 75. She was the first person named in the late author's will.

—Jeanne Hugo, the granddaughter of Victor Hugo, who was divorced a short time ago from her husband, is about to marry a young Parisian physician.

—Mary French Field, the accomplished young daughter of Eugene Field, is preparing herself to give public readings from her late father's poems.

—Alfred Rothschild is probably the greatest epicure in Europe. He keeps one chef doing nothing but making curries.

THE CARE OF TENNIS RACQUETS.—After being used in the wet, the frame of the racquet should be carefully dried and any frayed pieces of gut replaced in position, after which both sides of the face should be gently touched with a soft towel. The racquet should be kept in a dry place and in a flat wooden press; especial care should be taken that it is tightly screwed down after being used in the wet, or it will very often develop a decided warp in the course of a single night.

THE SUBMARINE BOAT.—A submarine boat, weighing ten tons, has been perfected for the French navy by M. Goubet, after the model described by Jules Verne in his famous novel. The boat is cigar-shaped and can contain three persons. Tanks enable it to rise or sink at a moment's notice. Motion is imparted by a screw attached to an electric motor. The naval authorities are satisfied with the trials held thus far.

HYPNOTISM BEFORE THE LAW.—The Russian Court of Appeals has allowed the plea of hypnotic influence as warrantable. A girl, condemned to death for poisoning her father, had her sentence commuted to five years' imprisonment, owing to having been under the control of a man who compelled her to commit the deed.

AN ACCIDENTAL DISCOVERY.—The metal pen was discovered accidentally by Joseph Gillot, a jeweler in Birmingham. He was called upon unexpectedly to sign a receipt, and happened to pick up a fine split tool used in his business, to write with. The idea of the pen point is said to have started from this incident.

THE MEANING OF TURKEY.—Turkey should really be written Turkia—the land of the Turks. It is also called the Ottoman Empire after Sultan Othman I. The term Sublime Porte, as applied to the Turkish Government, arose from the magnificent gate entrance to the imperial palace at Constantinople.

IMPROVED STORAGE BATTERIES.—A German factory is turning out fifty tons of storage batteries daily. The demand has been increased by a recent ingenious improvement of the lead plates, which can now be made extremely porous by the admixture of granulated pumice stone.

AN UNRELIABLE EXPLOSIVE.—Cordite can no longer be considered a satisfactory explosive. In a high temperature it is said to throw off nitrous fumes, which destroy the fulminating composition in the cap and render the cartridges innocuous.

AN ELECTRIC CRUISER.—A bill has been introduced in the Senate asking for the construction of an electric cruiser, equipped with electric motors and propellers as invented by Richard B. Painton. A speed is claimed of thirty-five knots an hour.

A SPIDER'S SIGHT.—Wisconsin experts state that the average spider sees its prey, when motionless, up to a distance of five inches, and when in motion at an even greater distance. They can see one another distinctly at twelve inches.

THE FIRST BALLOON.—The balloon is a French invention. A poor papermaker saw a starched petticoat, the string of which had been tightly drawn, rise in the air over a hot stove.

A USEFUL POINTER.—Dandruff may be removed by regularly washing the head with a thimbleful of powdered borax dissolved in a teacupful of water.

FOR ROUGH HANDS.—A mixture of glycerine and lemon juice can be applied to rough hands at night with much advantage.

CHEAPER POSTAGE.—A movement is on foot to bring about a one-cent rate of letter postage.

Mr. Poppy—My dear Miss Oldgirl, why do you not take advantage of leap year and get married? Miss Oldgirl—Because I am not yet able to earn enough to support a husband.

SO many and so charming were the entertainments given on the eve of Lent, that the guests thereat have not yet ceased to enlarge upon their delights. Especially has this been the case regarding the impromptu cotillion arranged by Mrs. John Cunningham, who, with the able assistance of Miss Minnie Houghton, carried out her idea with such success. Another most pleasant affair was Mrs. Bourne's card party and musicale, which was enjoyed by a large party until a late hour; and yet a third, Mrs. Luke Robinson's musicale and dance, interspersed with games, which provoked much merriment to those who participated.

As is often the case, while dancing is rather tabooed during Lent, gastronomy seems to take its place, and dinners have been rather coming to the front of late. The new Cliff House was the locale chosen by Mr. and Mrs. Mack for the banquet which they gave in honor of the prospective bride and groom, Miss Stella Greeuebaum and Alfred Simon, at which eighteen guests were seated. The festivities were prolonged until a late hour and heartily enjoyed. At Mrs. Shreve's dinner, where twelve guests were entertained, violets and roses were the flowers used for decorative purposes. Mrs. E. Heller's guests at her dinner numbered twenty, and the adornments were in gold color and most elaborate in detail, while the menu was simply perfect.

The pleasures of the present week have been intellectual as well as gastronomic, as for instance the illustrated lecture on Alaska, with vocal solos from Frank Coffin, Miss Bergelund and others, enjoyed by the Hawthorne Society on Tuesday evening; the Loring Club gave their first concert of the present season on Thursday evening, when Miss Della Mills was the vocalist of the occasion. Last evening, at Metropolitan Hall, Professor Star Jordan entertained a crowded audience with an illustrated lecture on the Yellowstone Park for the Camera Club, and last evening also the Native Sons' new hall was the scene of the appeal from the verdict of the ludicrous trial in Oakland of George Bromley for stealing the widow O'Grady's goat. It was under the auspices of the Mercantile Library Auxiliary, and among others Will Barnes, Milton Eisner, and Judge Ferrall took part, and assuredly the lecture which Frederick Warde will deliver next Wednesday on the Women of Shakespeare, for the benefit of the Woman's Exchange, will prove an intellectual treat.

Teas have not been so numerous since Lent began as it was thought they would be, but several are said to be in contemplation for the next two weeks. To-day Mrs. Robert McLane will give one of her delightful teas at her residence in the Western Addition.

The telegraph has brought us news of the Huntington-Holladay wedding, which took place at noon on Tuesday last in New York city, which was solemnized in the salon of the new residence of the bride's uncle, C. P. Huntington, on Fifth avenue. The Rev. Frank Clendennin, of St. Peter's Church, Westchester, tied the nuptial knot in the presence of a limited number of relatives and friends, after which an elaborate wedding breakfast was served. The bride wore an elegant robe of heavy white satin profusely trimmed with point lace; her veil was held in place by a wreath of orange blossoms, and her ornaments were diamonds. She was attended by Miss Yager as maid-of-honor, and Edward H. Pardee supported the groom as his best man. There were no other attendants.

The sad death of Mrs. O. O. Burgess, recently, leaves a gap in society which will not easily be filled, and a host of friends who will long mourn her loss. Mrs. Burgess united, in a marked degree, the qualities of head and heart which go to make the Christian gentlewoman, and was not only a delightful social companion, but a kind, true friend and charitable church worker.

The tenth anniversary of the Laurel Hall Club was celebrated last week by a commemorative performance, in which Mrs. John Farnham and Mrs. Thomas W. Collins read papers, Miss Clara Fisher recited, and Miss Anita Murray sang, and the rest of the assemblage enjoyed the programme greatly, and finally the new officers for 1896 were installed. On Friday evening Stanford Parlor, N. S. G. W., celebrated its tenth anniversary in the Native Sons' new hall, at which dancing was the feature. The attendance was very large, and the festivities continued until far on towards morning. On last Saturday evening Mrs. E. Black gave an "at home" at her residence on Devisadero street, which was prettily decorated with ferns, foliage, and pink blossoms. Miss Charlotte Jewell, niece of the hostess, was the leading spirit of the affair, and the entertainment of the evening included music, dancing, and supper.

Prince Luigi of Savoy and the officers of the Italian frigate, the Christoforo Colombo, will surely bear away with them, when they sail to-morrow, pleasant memories of the many hospitalities extended them during their stay in San Francisco harbor. The Prince has been very extensively entertained, not alone in the city itself, but in different parts of the country, by his fellow countrymen of sunny Italy. At Burlingame, too, he has been a favorite guest, from his fondness for horses and field sports as much as for the pleasure derived from personal fellowship. Last Saturday there was a large gathering at the Club, the pleasures provided for the guests including a steeple chase for the cup presented by the Prince and won by young McCreary; polo, and finally an elaborate banquet. The officers of the frigate have also been handsomely entertained by the San Francisco ladies. Among the most recent of these affairs were Miss Clara Sutro's luncheon party, at Sutro Heights, and the dinner at which Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Jennings presided as host and hostess in the private dining room of the Hotel Oliver. Peach blossoms, pink satin ribbons, and fairy lamps, with pink shades, were the adornments of the round table, at which a dozen guests discussed an elaborate menu, after which there was a musical programme.

Miss Minnie Burton, who is the guest of Mrs. Duke Baxter, nee Hilda McDonald, in Santa Barbara, has been the recipient of many hospitalities during her stay in that charming locale. Miss Burton will remain in Santa Barbara for some time yet, and will probably visit friends in San Diego before her return home.

The Henry Neustadters and the J. H. Neustadters are making the tour of Europe together. By latest intelligence received here from them they were enjoying themselves in Nice, and from there were to go to Rome and then Paris.

This afternoon's Carr-Beel Pop. Concert at Golden Gate Hall offers one of the finest programmes of chamber music ever given in this city.

Miss Bertha Fuller, daughter of W. P. Fuller, of this city, was married to Mr. Charles A. Kinkelin, on the 20th inst. The ceremony took place at the home of the bride, and was performed by the Reverend Horatio Stebbins.

Among the gay doings of next week will be the wedding of Miss Betty Wasserman and Sig Kaufman, which will be celebrated in elaborate style at Union Square Hall on Tuesday, the 4th.

The Fiery Ordeal

From Vanity.

THIS story was told me when I was quite a boy by a contemporary of my grandfather's. In just what year the events narrated happened my love of accuracy forbids me to state positively, but it must have been early in 1800, I think. The story, which I will transcribe as nearly as possible in the words of my old friend, runs as follows:

"It was a bitter cold night in February; the luxurious rooms of the 'Fire Club,' on Franklin Square, at the corner of Dover street, were brilliantly lighted. The members, all men well known and prominent in the business and professional circles of New York, had assembled to do honor to a great New Orleans merchant who was making a flying visit to this city.

"A man by the name of Smith—Thomas H. Smith, one of the greatest tea merchants of the day—was our President. Poor old Smith! he had been dead many a day; but I would like here to pay this tribute to his memory and say that, in spite of his extraordinary business qualifications, he was one of the jolliest and most whole-souled fellows I ever knew. Then there was Charles Town, Peter and Benjamin Stagg, Joseph Foulke and Matthias Bruen—all fine fellows, particular eboms of mine, and all dead long ago—died of old age, most of 'em. Yet I'm alive to tell this tale—the last leaf—and no evidence of dropping off yet awhile.

"Well, as I have said, a great New Orleans merchant was the guest on the particular evening in question. Dinner had progressed to the last stages and we were all of us in extraordinary good humor. Suddenly President Smith rapped on the table and called 'order,' then he began to speak:

"Gentlemen," said he, 'for the benefit of the guest who has honored us with his presence this evening, I wish to explain some of the aims and objects of this distinguished organization of which I have the honor to be president—the Fire Club. It is not called into being for any purpose on earth save the enjoyment and amusement of its members. There are certain rules imposed, conformity to which—contrary to the nature of rules in such cases, which I believe are more honored in the breach than the observance—we find aids us greatly in producing the noble result aimed at. One of these rules demands absolute obedience to the instructions and commands of the Club's president, during the hours of session. In a word, I am monarch here for the time being, and it is the duty of my subjects to obey my behests—to shrink from no task I may impose on each or all of them. To become a member of our organization a man must consent to this condition, and even our guests are expected to comply with its requirements.'

The New Orleans man smiled. 'Very good,' said he.

"Now, among our most favored amusements," continued Smith, 'is the old game of Follow your leader. The man who refuses to follow me, or any deputy I choose to appoint, whithersoever I go, whether he be guest or member, pays to the Club no less a forfeit than one dozen bottles of champagne.'

"Very good, indeed," again laughed our guest. 'I agree to all the conditions.'

"It is well," replied Smith, and suddenly rose from the table. 'Follow your leader,' he shouted, and darted out of the warm, cosy club-rooms, followed by the thirty Club members and our guest. Down into the cold street, bare-headed, he ran, and, like the 'noble six hundred,' not a man Jack of us flinched from our duty. Out of the square and round the corner of Dover street dashed Smith, we after him, yelling and laughing. Down Dover, past Front into South street, thence onto the pier, at which lay one of Smith's own ships. Not a protest was uttered as our leader, with a wild yell of 'Follow all,' plunged off the pier into the East River. There were thirty—no, thirty-one successive splashes, as one by one the Fire Club members and their devoted guest followed the intrepid Smith. The tide was low, fortunately, and we all managed to wade through the waist-high, icy water, and scramble on board a lighter and thence to the shore. The New Orleans man was the last. I waited till I saw him safe and sound on terra firma, and then we rushed on in our freezing clothes.

"What store is that," he panted, pointing to a big store still open on South street.

"Billson's, the ship chandler's," I replied.

"I want to stop and get a drink and a cloak, if I can. Go on," he cried, 'and say I'm coming.'

"He was not long after me, and, on entering the Club, wrapped in a voluminous cloak he had bought or borrowed from the ship chandler, was greeted with wild cheers.

"I congratulate you upon having played your part in the game of 'Follow the leader' so skillfully and well," said I, drawing him aside. 'According to all precedent, you will now be made leader and the Club placed at your disposal for the balance of the evening—that is, if you care to exercise the privilege.'

"I do, most assuredly," he replied, and moved toward the cloak-room. 'You see, gentlemen,' continued he, turning suddenly, and holding up a large bundle he had concealed in the folds of his cloak, 'I did some shopping while we were out. I wish to bestow my purchase where no harm can come to it—it is precious.'

"After depositing his cloak and bundle in the cloak-room, he returned to the table, where, amid the popping of champagne corks and the wildest hilarity, his health was proposed and drunk.

"Order, order!" yelled Smith. 'Members of the Club, hearken to the voice of your President. Having bravely and unflinchingly submitted to the test imposed upon him by the rules of our Club, and come out, not only none the worse, but seemingly brighter and more cheerful from his bath in the East River, I herewith formally invest our guest with the leadership of the Club and the power to exact implicit obedience from its members during the balance of the night. What say you, brave Southerner?'

"That I do thank the most noble President and members of the Fire Club for the honor thus bestowed, and that I do accept the same. Nor will your duty as my followers lead you outside the warm, luxurious precincts of your club-rooms. I only ask allegiance from you all in this, that you keep seated till I give the word to rise.'

"Amid a curious silence, the Southerner now took from his breast-pocket a large piece of tow, which he proceeded to twist into a long string. When he had spun it out to eighteen or twenty feet, he rose.

"Remain seated, gentlemen," said he, and going to the cloak-room fetched the bundle previously deposited there. 'Now, President and friends,' he resumed, removing the wrappers and displaying a small keg, 'I have but a few words to say, and then the game will begin. You have tried me and not found me wanting. I, who come from the warm South, have been submitted to an icy ordeal. We will now reverse this order of things. I call upon you all, in the name of your sacred Fire Club, to submit to the fiery ordeal I shall now subject you to? With that he knocked out the head of the cask and, taking some of its contents to the fire, sprinkled it upon the coals. Instantly there was a small explosion.

"Powder," said Smith.

"Powder!" exclaimed the Club members.

"Yes, powder," calmly repeated the New Orleans man.

'I bought it at the ship chandler's on my way back from the river. And now, you see, I light one end of the fuse I have just made in the fire, the other end, you will observe, I insert in the head of the keg, which I will place on the floor close beside your honored President. All is now in readiness. It but remains for us to wait. This game plays itself.'

'He seated himself calmly and proposed a toast to 'President Smith.' That gentleman twisted uncomfortably in his chair, but retained sufficient presence of mind to rise and reply. Joe Foulke plucked me uneasily by the sleeve.

'I say, Tom, there won't be an honored President much longer if we don't all get out of this. Look at that fuse.'

'I looked. Already it had burned nearly half way to the keg. A solemn silence settled down upon the company. Attention was divided between the fuse and the New Orleans man, who continued to talk and laugh unconcernedly.

'I seem to be monopolizing the conversation,' said he at last to Smith, who sat grasping the arms of his chair and glancing from one to the other of us with a pathetic appeal in his eyes. 'Pardon me, but why are you all so silent? Come, drink to the success of our game. Ah, how fast that fuse burns—I thought it would last longer.'

'Stealthily, creeping along the tow, with now and then a little flash and splutter, came the fire. It was now within a few feet of the keg.

'My God,' suddenly yelled Smith. 'We shall be blowed up if we stay here. Gentlemen, follow your President,' and he sprang up and dashed out of the Club, followed by every man of us except our guest, whom we left to his fate.

'In the course of half an hour, seeing that no explosion occurred in the club-rooms, we went cautiously back. The New Orleans man was still seated at the table, and had just opened another bottle of champagne as we entered.

'It's cold in the street,' he remarked to Smith. 'You are a precipitate lot of fellows. By the way, there are thirty-one dozen bottles of champagne owing to the Club by its members. See, I have put out the fuse. Sit down.'

THE DAWNING REVELATIONS.

Now that seers of modern science flash with cathode rays defiance
Through those substances we used to call opaque,

Let the rising generation quake with fear and trepidation
At the awful revelations they will make.

Many foreheads cleft with ridges that bespeak a brain prodigious

Will he found to cover nothing but a wheel;
Many peach and cream complexions will reveal, through these dissections, Skins the color of an old banana peel.

And if rays should be directed through the breast of some rejected

Man who wails his heart is broke or something worse,

In nine-tenths of all the cases it is safe to say the basis

Of the breaking would be found to be the purse.

And it is a question whether many a shoe of patent leather—

Could these rays but pierce the upper and the sole—

Would present a cotton stocking of immodesty so shocking

That each toe is robbed of clothing by a hole.

But the saddest revelation of this modern innovation

Would be brought upon our sample hunting shoppers;

For if science e'er disperses rays of light throughout their purses

It were doubtful if they'd fall on aught hut coppers.

THE arrest of the Nevada Bank forgers is good news. Better it will be when they are convicted and receive life terms at the public expense.

THE associated city creditors are again after the money due them. Probably this is why Treasurer Widber is making an arsenal of the City and County Treasury.

WHY not let us build the two new revenue cutters allowed by the Squire bill? As they are for this coast we ought to have the privilege of constructing them.

JUDGE York is to be commended for committing the boy burglars to Folsom for ten years. Crime is on the increase, and the infliction of severe punishment is more likely to put a stop to it than would be a temporary sojourn in a reform school.

THE Board of Health has declared that the drinking water supplied by the Spring Valley Water Company is pure and healthful and everything that can be desired. This was known before, but it is better to have the opinion of specialists upon the matter.

THE Rev. Colburn, pastor of Grace M. E. Church, San Francisco, may fancy that he can weather that arrest, but he errs. It is true that the nature of the offense for which he was seized by the Park police forbids public discussion of his case, but he must demand an investigation of the arresting officers by the Park Commissioners or make up his mind to get out—not only out of San Francisco, but out of the society of natural men. The nerve that enables him, under the unmentionable circumstances, to rise and preach may be sanctified nerve, but that does not make the spectacle of the Reverend Colburn in a pulpit tolerable.

JUDGE W. W. Morrow gave an interesting lecture before the Mechanics' Institute last Saturday evening on the subject of "Six Years with Statesmen." The information he imparted was interesting in the extreme and the large audience listened to him attentively from the beginning to the end of the lecture.

THE request of the Merchants' Association that directories of the respective floors of the City Hall be placed at corridor crossings in that building is a good one. A corps of Indian guides would not be out of place, and policemen could also be stationed there, so that, when a crime is committed, we should know where to look for one.

PARK Superintendent McLaren, who is supervising the work on the ocean driveway, states that everything is progressing satisfactorily, and that the new boulevard, to run along the ocean side of the Park for two miles to where the Ocean House and Ingelside roads meet, will be finished about the end of the month.

IN his denunciation of political religious societies, Rabbi Voorsanger has expressed a sentiment that will find answer in the breast of every broad-minded man. The presence of such societies in our midst is a continuous and ever-growing menace to the Republic, and one which, if allowed to exist, will foster individual hatreds antagonistic to the future welfare of the nation.

GOVERNOR Budd did the right thing when he objected to the payment of exorbitant hack bills for the transportation of prisoners while under the care of the Sheriff. The public moneys can be put to better use than to be squandered on such gentry. Should it be impossible to secure contracts for the work at a reasonable figure, the prisoners should be securely chained and taken to their destination on foot.

A COALITION of European powers against the United States is a possibility of the next few years. The forces at our disposal are not such as to enable us to combat a combination successfully, and it is time to stop the tongues of the jingoes who will assuredly bring disaster upon the country. Diplomats, not bar-room politicians thirsty for the applause of the mob, are needed to ensure for us the respect of other nations.

SENATOR Proctor, of Vermont, lately addressed the Senate on the subject of coast defenses, stating that land fortifications are of more value than is a powerful navy. We take issue with the Senator on this point and hold that a powerful fleet would make coast fortifications unnecessary. The best military authorities of France and Germany coincide with our views. We want a goodly number of powerful cruisers and battleships, and we want them built on this coast, too.

IT is a matter of great importance for the people of this city to consider the pros and cons of the New Charter, so that they may act intelligently when the next general election comes round. One of the chief matters to receive attention is the great power that will become vested in the Mayor. Many are opposed to this, holding that it should be vested in the people alone. Others claim that by giving the city's highest official fullest authority, he becomes responsible for good government. A point in favor of its adoption is that it will allow of changes being made in municipal affairs to suit the demands of coming generations. This is a decided improvement on over present cast-iron Charter.

CAN WE FIGHT THE WORLD.

It appears to have become the favorite pastime of the Congress of the United States to shake its fist under the nose of the civilized world and challenge it to combat. If it were the desire of the people to transform the republic into a warlike empire, committed to expansion by conquest, the ferocity of Congress would be in keeping with such a policy; but as the people of this country have as yet no such imperial ambition, they are being misrepresented, and dangerously misrepresented at Washington. Sooner or later the sort of talk that has become habitual in Congress must involve us in war. It is inevitable that it should do so, for we cannot expect the world to understand that the truculence of our statesmen is less than half meant, and is not taken seriously by nine-tenths of their constituents.

It is natural that Spain, for example, should be exasperated by the speeches in the Senate and House which accompanied the passage of the concurrent resolution recognizing the belligerency of the Cuban rebels. It is the right of the United States to give that recognition if it so desires, either on the ground of sympathetic sentiment, commercial interest, or no ground at all; but the United States has no right, in international usage or common courtesy, to accompany the act of recognition with gratuitous insults to Spain. Had the position of the countries been reversed, and such speeches as were uttered in Congress been spoken in the Cortes, the American people would have taken them no more quietly than the Spanish people have done. These speeches were foolish in policy, ungenerous in spirit, infamously ill-bred in manner, and altogether as discreditable as they were indefensible.

The truth is that our Congressmen, aware that the public does not take at face value their menacing thunders against the effete monarchies and tottering despotisms of the earth, launch their oratorical bolts with no proper sense of responsibility. Behind their blood-curdling periods is the comfortable expectation that they will be discounted seventy-five per cent, abroad as well as at home. Note in illustration this Cuban incident. Had any other prominent legislative body in the world prefaced action with language so fierce, that action would not have stopped short of a declaration of war. But our Congress, after all its furious eloquence, prudently placed the President between itself and the responsibility of making good its militant words. It passed a concurrent resolution only, with which the President may do what he pleases. Despite its verbal sword-clanking, Congress shrank from going so far as a joint resolution. That might have been vetoed, and then Congress would be required either to stand its ground or back down. It prefers to play at war-making, and is satisfied with the half-laughing applause of the domestic gallery.

Unfortunately, the rest of mankind does not comprehend Congress as well as the American people do. We have become a nation immensely powerful in numbers and wealth. The republic is a military potentiality of the first rank. It is not surprising, therefore, that Europe should be seriously concerned when our national voice is heard on international subjects. Were we to enter upon a war, our resources in money and men would make us so formidable that the nations cannot but think of the possibilities to the present balance of power. If once we abandon our traditional policy of non-intervention and take to minding other people's business instead of our own, it is reasonably certain that Europe, moved by the instinct of self-preservation, will combine against us. The tone of the press of every country on the other side of the Atlantic relative to our actions respecting Venezuela and Cuba indicates with entire clearness what we must face should the fulminations of Congress at any time be succeeded by hostilities with any country.

In herself Spain is so enfeebled by age that the least valorous of Congressmen need not blanch at the thought of war with her. But, as the newspapers of Madrid and Havana exultantly point out, Spain, in the event of war, would not be isolated. She would, as they say, doubtless receive the open or covert aid of every other nation in Europe.

We are heading directly for gigantic trouble. The men who talk war, in Congress and out of it, are—for the most part unconsciously—preparing the way for a struggle which will have on one side the United States and on the other most of the powers of Europe, and some of those on this hemisphere also. For our Monroe doctrine, as newly interpreted, is not well received by many of the Spanish-American republics. They, like jealous European statesmen, see behind our solicitude for our American neighbors a claim to suzerainty which in the future will lead to interference and then annexation, as our interest may dictate.

Not until the United States feels strong enough to do battle with a European coalition like that which crushed Napoleon, can she safely engage in war, even with decrepit Spain.

The Case for Refunding Ablly Presented.

When the House Committee the other day gave a hearing to Lawyer Hubbard, who represents the Searles-Hopkins interest in the Central Pacific Railroad, it got down, for the first time, to the real business in hand. Up to then the time of the Committee had been taken up in time-worn and useless recriminations. Mr. Huntington, as a multi-millionaire, a magnate of Wall street, a father of a Princess, and, withal, a specimen of stalwart physical and mental manhood rarely met with, has been a good man to badger, and worry, and stick pins in. Accordingly, the people of the Pacific Coast, through their newspapers, have been daily regaled for weeks past with spicy accounts of a few things that have happened, and with a great many more that are purely imaginative. Senator Morgan, filled to overflowing in more senses than one, and prompted from time to time by a posse of Bohemians and disgruntled politicians, imported for the purpose at the cost of a certain New York syndicate, has for two weeks past conducted himself in a way that has disgusted his colleagues on the committee, forced indignant utterances as to his insobriety from such respectable journals as the Boston Herald and New York Nation, and turned what ought to have been a sober, serious and sedate Congressional inquiry into what, if it were not so painful, would be a farcical exhibition. This state of facts is, we know, very different from that which the Syndicate's Newspaper Bureau is daily peddling out to our people as the happenings of the National Capital. No such reports as theirs find their way into any Eastern newspaper of standing. So that they utterly lack that corroboration which the independent press of the country is accustomed to lay before its readers when matters of large public interest are involved. As a matter of fact, so palpable that he who runs may read, it is obvious that syndicate money is talking with sinister intent, to the end that our people may be induced to lend themselves to a railroad disruption that would, for a time at least, paralyze every interest on this coast, and that even in the end would leave our second condition far worse than our first is alleged to be, and would, furthermore, deprive the Government of every ray of hope of ever recovering any portion of its advances.

The question before Congress is not as to whether any errors have been committed in the past, nor as to whether the builders of the first great transcontinental railroad made fortunes out of it, but whether that railroad is to be made an exception to the rule by the making of the unreasonable and unparalleled demand that it shall repay the cost of its construction within the first twenty-five years of its completion. No railroad in this country, or in any other with which we are acquainted, has been asked to do so much. Our own, as well as other new countries, have all they can do to build roads to meet the requirements of increasing populations. This railroad era has made stupendous demands upon the capital of the world, and marvelously well has the world's capital responded. Industrial enterprise has all it can do, for the time being, to earn and pay interest on the roads it has need of. That is all that it is reasonable to ask of this generation to do. Indeed, it is all that it can do. The future can very safely, we believe, be trusted to take care of itself. When the population of the United States has doubled, as it will have done in an incredibly short time, it will be easy to bear burdens that to-day would be intolerable. The Central Pacific's indebtedness, like that of all the other railroads in the country, must be paid off as rapidly as increased population yields increased earnings. To demand anything more is to ask for that which is not only exceptional and unreasonable, but impossible. Moreover, the interests of the produers of this Coast are not to be conserved or advantaged in any conceivable way, by increased governmental demands on the railroad. The higher the interest paid by the road to the Government, the higher must fares and freights necessarily be. To cry for twenty-five per cent. reduction on freight charges, as political platforms have been accustomed to do, and, at the same time, to insist upon larger payments to the Government than the higher charges yield, is an absurd inconsistency that deprives California of standing before the Congressional committees, and of the respect of Eastern public opinion.

One point which Mr. Hubbard made very clear to the Committee the other day, has been by the syndicate's organs constantly befogged or kept in the background. It has been repeatedly insinuated here, especially in country journals, that in order to comply with the conditions of the proposed refunding bill, the railroad would have to raise its rates. It is a curious objection to come from people who pretend to think that both principal and interest ought by this time to have been extinguished. As a matter of fact the statement is erroneous. The money that now goes into the sinking fund under the Thurman act would, in the event of the passage of the refunding bill, go to pay the interest on the bonds indorsed by the Government. In which case, of course, there would be no necessity for any increased charges on the part of the railroad. The Thurman act now sets aside sufficient money to meet the requirements of the proposed refunding bill. Mr. Hubbard gave the figures in a way that was clear and convincing. The objection is made here that the railroad ought to pay more than two per cent. interest on its debt, and of course it ought, if it could. But that's the rub. To pay a higher interest would call for increased freight charges. As the rest of the country, through its representatives in Congress, is willing to make a settlement on that basis, why should California object? As the money would cost the Government about three and one-half per cent., the proposed arrangement would be equal to giving California's producers a subvention of one and one-half per cent. The Government has derived advantages in many ways from the building of the road, and can well afford to make this small loss. The circumstances under which the road was built entitle it to at least that much consideration. The presentation of the case made by Mr. Hubbard indicates a trained mind and a strong man—an accession of strength to the railroad forces that can hardly fail to be welcome just now.

The President's Chances. Whether Mr. Cleveland would or would not accept another nomination for the Presidency, he continues to be spoken of as a possibility by those in a position to speak upon the subject. Mr. Frederic R. Conder, an intimate friend of the President and a member of the Venezuelan Commission, is of the opinion that he might possibly run for a third term, should certain circumstances arise which would warrant it, and Mr. Hornblower inclines to the same view. These gentlemen doubtless have substantial reasons for the attitude they take upon this question and their words must carry much weight. Other watchers of the political horizon and friends of Mr. Cleveland, are of the same opinion and only a denial by the President himself will establish the fact that he is desirous of letting some one else carry the responsibility of government upon his shoulders.

Mr. Cleveland is the one Democrat of to-day who has any positive strength whatever and who commands the respect and admiration of the better part of the Democracy. He has enemies, doubtless, as every great man must have; but the men who are opposed to him are of the Tillman order, servile in truckling to demagoguery, and are entirely outnumbered by the better class of Democratic citizens who believe in him and prefer him to any other man who has been mentioned. He is a man such as the Democracy needs to-day, a man of courage, of convictions and able to command for America the respect of other nations. He is moreover a statesman of recognized ability, cautious, yet swift to act when necessity so demands. It is to be sincerely hoped that he may finally decide to accept the nomination. The interests of the country demand it.

The Doomed Salvation Army. The Salvation Army is going the way of all Protestant flesh. The right of private judgment in religion, the principle of Luther's Reformation, is necessarily disintegrating. That may, or may not be desirable, but it is not to be escaped. Though the trouble between Ballington Booth and his father, the Army's Pope, may be patched up, division is sure to come. And the end of the Army's peculiar usefulness is not far away. The organization is bound to develop into an orderly, conventional sect like the others. From the day it began to be patronized and encouraged by the respectabilities of the earth, the Salvation Army's career could be predicted. Only when enthusiasts are persecuted and ridiculed does their fervor maintain itself at fever heat. When they are despitely used and scorned, then they feel that they are not of this world, and defy the world's opinion. But when the powerful and decorous give their protection and approval, zeal wanes and common sense asserts its claims.

The Salvation Army has done a great work. It has given an example of real Christianity in a time of more than languid faith. It has gone down among the publicans and sinners, who are no better liked by the Pharisees of the temple now than they were in the days of Jesus. It has worked on the theory that Christ came to save sinners, and that, therefore, the more degraded the sinner the greater his need of Christ. This example first put the churches to shame and incurred their hostility, but compromise ensued, and the churches gave their countenance. This was creditable to the churches but fatal to the Salvation Army. It insured its transformation into a church in due season.

As the Army grows in respectability there will be secessions from time to time, for the more zealous will demand sacrifices of dignity which a sect increasing in wealth and decorum will be increasingly averse from making. The phenomena of Methodism in its successive stages of evolution are in process of repetition.

A Judgment Which is Generally Approved. It is not often that unanimity prevails on the United States Supreme Bench in the keenly contested cases.

It is still less frequent that the same judgment on all points is arrived at by three separate and different courts. The fact that all this has happened in the case of the United States against the Stanford estate, ought to be accepted on all sides as conclusive that there never was either law or equity on the side of those who contended that the builders of the Central Pacific had no right to make a profit out of that enterprise, and should, in consequence, be stripped of their private fortunes. The case of the Government was ably presented by a capable lawyer whose personal feelings rendered his arduous task quite congenial. The suit was originated in the United States Court for the Ninth District. Judge Ross, as able and as pure a Judge as sits on any Federal Bench, rendered a remarkably clear and well reasoned judgment in favor of the Stanford estate. From that decision an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, with the result that Judge Ross was sustained. That resort would then be had to the highest appellate court in the land was to be expected; with what result we now know. The United States Supreme Court unanimously agrees with the two Courts below, and in rendering its judgment makes it abundantly clear that the Government got all that it contracted for, and at the price it had agreed to pay,—and that no wrong, whether in morals, law, or equity, was done by anybody. If the unanimous finding of that great tribunal does not forever set at rest the many doubts and suspicions that have arisen in this connection, it then becomes certain that there are men—Judge Maguire seems to be a sample—whom nothing short of a decree of Heaven would satisfy. It is certain that among thinking men pretty much the same unanimity prevails as was found on the Supreme Bench. Everybody is rejoiced that Mrs. Stanford has triumphed and is now free to continue the great work her noble husband left her to do. The Leland Stanford Jr. University is safe and those fifteen millions of dollars will remain in California and fructify and yield blessings to generations yet unborn.

A Moral Malformation.

It is well for the Rev. Dr. Brown that the court before which he is on trial is composed of men of God and not men of the world. He is a revolting creature. In his endeavors to clear himself of the charge of adultery he has succeeded in convicting himself of offenses for which excuses are far less readily found. To save himself, he has placed upon the stand a young woman who, in his interest, has confessed herself to be a degraded criminal. Miss Overman asked the court to believe that she had been in love with her pastor, and that he played Joseph to her Mrs. Potiphar; that in revenge she entered upon a scheme of forgery and blackmail, repented herself, then, despite repentance, lied to conceal her guilt from the occasion of it, and freely made this public sacrifice of her character before the Council in behalf of an innocent and injured saint.

This woman has been kept secluded for many weeks in his own home by the blameless Brown. He cries out in unselfish fervor that her self-immolation is "Christ-like." So it would be were it possible to credit her monstrous tale. But we have to believe too much in order to credit unhappy Mattie Overman. Her story is so fitted to meet the needs of the situation, so stretched here and there to cover damaging points of the prosecution's evidence, that probability, instead of favoring its truth, favors the theory that the narrative was constructed under the desperate superintendence of its reverend beneficiary. He had her sequestered in his house; he had put Mrs. Davidson in jail, and Miss Overman's intelligence is not as great as her woman's terror of the law.

The spectacle of that pale, unlovely, and nervously smirking woman on the stand, asserting under oath that she had forged letters intended to prove herself a wanton, and then had endeavored to sell to a newspaper that forged evidence of her loss of what every woman prizes, ought to have been enough for the Council. Men with hearts and stomachs, looking upon Brown as he sat there directing the telling of the squalid and incredible romance, felt that he was better suited to the stripes of the convict than the robes of a clergyman. Had the Council then and there risen, refusing to hear more, it would have attested its manhood.

Though Brown should be given a verdict of acquittal and a coat of brotherly whitewash an inch thick, he has revealed himself in so despicable and abhorrent a light that decent men of ordinary principles and normal sensibilities turn from him in contemptuous disgust. That a creature of such capacity for debasement should have been able to maintain himself in the ministry for a quarter of a century is an indictment of the intelligence and moral penetration of the churches whose pulpits he has occupied. That he will be permitted to occupy another we are not willing to think possible, for we are not willing to believe that Brown's clerical brethren, who have his professional fate in their hands, are less susceptible to the shame of his ministry than are even the most careless men of the world.

A Growing Nuisance.

One of the many nuisances connected with cable-car travel in San Francisco, is the ever-growing unwillingness of the gripmen to stop the cars should a gentleman wish to board them. A pretence of doing so is usually resorted to by letting go the grip; the brake, however, is not put in action and the result is that the car is carried on with an increased impetus, during which the person wishing to ride must either jump on as best he may or else await the coming of another car. This wilful negligence on the part of employees results in daily accidents, sometimes of a trivial, more often of a serious nature, to business men and others who contribute materially toward the expenses of the respective lines. Apparently there is no redress for injuries acquired in this manner, although a test case—should anyone have the money and pluck to fight it—might possibly bring about some change in the present disgraceful state of affairs. It is not to be doubted for one instant but that the employers of these men are aware of the methods they resort to in the fulfillment of their duties. The daily press has constantly brought the matter before their notice, and has repeatedly requested that lives and limbs be no longer jeopardized for the gain of a few minutes. The actions of the men are apparently winked at and they can defy with impunity their rules and regulations, knowing that no punishment will follow the infraction of them. We take, however, this opportunity of again calling the attention of the people at headquarters to the matter, in hopes that they may see fit to drive the fact into their gripmen's granite skulls that gentlemen are entitled to the same privileges accorded to ladies, and that the cars must be stopped for them if they so desire. Should, as hitherto, no good results accrue from our suggestion, then we will continue to agitate the matter before the general public and can undertake not to come out of the fight as losers.

Germany and Jingoism.

The Germans are proving themselves a nation of Jingoese. Since the unification of the empire, the war spirit has steadily been developing until it constitutes to-day a menace, not only to the other European countries, but also to the world in general. The victories of 1870-1871 have had a detrimental influence over the people, in that they have aroused in them a desire for further conquests and an appetite for colonization, aggravated by the knowledge that but little of the world's surface remains to-day unoccupied. When in the eighties the Germans established themselves in Africa, little notice was taken of the move except by the Conservatives, who were opposed to German colonies as being likely to weaken the resources of the Empire. The first small colony there has now extended to a large "field of influence" and the necessity for more soldiers to protect it increases daily. The advent of the present Emperor upon the stage of German affairs, with his hot-headed foreign policy and medieval idea of military home government, has rapidly brought affairs to a crisis, owing to his antagonistic attitude towards the other colonizing powers with whom he comes in contact. A young man, backed by a powerful army and with a good navy at his disposal,—both of which are as yet apparently unlearned in the socialistic doctrines affecting the agricultural and industrial classes,—and lacking the maturer wisdom of the men who brought the nation under one head, Emperor William is to-day on a fair road to bringing about a dismemberment of the Empire and a cataclysm of anarchy such as has been unheard of before in the history of the world. With growing troubles at home and a possible alliance of at least three powers against him, England, France and Russia, all of which view with dismay his growing dominance in Europe, the German Emperor stands upon the brink of a precipice, a downfall into which can only be averted by a speedy return to the former policy of wise and beneficent conservatism.

The Italian Disaster.

Reports concerning the riots said to be prevalent all over Italy, owing to the terrible defeat administered General Baratieri by the Abyssinians, must be received with the customary large allowance of salt. It is probable that, as we go to press reliable information will reach us and will be imparted in the morning's papers, but at present everything is left to conjecture. That the matter is a grave one is beyond doubt. Taking into consideration the hot-headedness of the people and the fact that a large majority of them consider Italy's financial troubles due to Premier Crispi's policy, there would seem to be reason enough to think that the revolution which has been gradually ripening these last few years will now burst into full blossom. There are, however, other people who will uphold the Premier and prove that under his guidance Italy, in many respects, has pushed herself materially to the front in the rank of the nations. In certain English diplomatic circles he has the reputation of being an able man and devoted to the interests of his country, which facts should be remembered in his favor. It is generally conceded that the late disaster was brought about by General Baratieri's own foolhardiness, and it is difficult to see why the Ministry should be held responsible for his unauthorized actions. Even though Crispi has handed in his resignation and the same has been accepted, it is probably only a matter of time before he will be taken back to favor, as he certainly is one of the most capable men at the disposition of the country. As for the defeated General, further developments may bring extenuating circumstances in his case to light; if not, he should forestall dishonor by a speedy death.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

THIS week we present to our readers a view of San Francisco from Broadway and Devisadero streets, looking northeast. This district has only been built up during the last few years, none of the larger residences in the foreground being over two years old. Immediately in the background will be seen the large tract of land, redeemed from a useless swamp by the enterprise of the late Senator Fair. The water between the shore line and the stone breakwater, shown in the illustration, is also being filled in, and in time will be ready for building purposes. To the extreme right of the picture can be seen Fort Mason, otherwise known as Black Point, and between it and the Fair lands is the property and plant of the San Francisco Gas Light Company, with the two huge gasometers and wharf jutting into the bay. To the left, Angel Island rears its stately form, and, in the very middle of the picture, can be seen the fortified island of Alcatraz—the Malta of the West. Behind Angel Island the shores of Contra Costa County are dimly discernible, running into those of fair Alameda County on the right.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

EDITOR NEWS LETTER, Sir:—Recurring to Mr. Scott's article "Hard Times," in the February Overland, he takes, for example, the year 1889 as a criterion which, with corrections, I am willing to accept. He states the silver output of the world for that year at $64,800,000, which is approximately correct,—seeing that the Director of the Mint gives it at $64,646,000. But note the method of the comparison that follows. He tells us that "in 1894, owing to the great depreciation in the price of silver, many of our silver mines were compelled to stop work, and our yield of silver was, as measured in gold, $14,350,000." Here is an apparent falling off within the five years embraced, of $50,450,000 or 73 per cent, which is scarcely less remarkable, as a simple statement of fact, than his estimate for the current year which he places at $4,000,000, though as I have already stated we have indications, from the output of 1893, that it will probably be $40,000,000.

The defect of this comparison arises from the fact that Mr. Scott states the output of silver in 1889 at its "coining" value of $1.29.29 per fine ounce, while he states that of 1894 at its "commercial" value, which averaged for that year less than 64 cents per ounce. And even at that, he states the amount inaccurately. As given above, he makes it $14,350,000, whereas the Director of the Mint gives it at $31,422,000 or something over $17,000,000 more. But the true measure of the quantity produced is its weight in ounces of pure silver and not its value. In order to show, therefore, the relative output, and the extent to which the alleged "great depreciation" of silver compelled "our miners to stop work," I give below the actual amounts as stated by the Mint Director:

1889 Fine ozs. 50,000,000 Com. Val. $46,750,000 Coing Val. $64,646,000
1894 Fine ozs. 49,500,000 Com. Val. $31,422,000 Coing Val. $64,000,000

It will thus be seen that the falling off was only 500,000 ounces, or one per cent of the mass, while the increase of gold was over 20 per cent., and for 1895 was 50 per cent. The same erroneous form of statements is observable in other items. He tells us, for example, that from 1873 to 1892 the world produced $2,224,000,000 of silver, estimated at $1.29 per ounce, but that "demonetization" had "reduced" this value "as measured in gold, fifty per cent. and had reduced the world's entire amount of silver extant, nearly $2,000,000,000." Now the table from which Mr. Scott apparently takes these figures shows that the "coining" value of the silver produced from 1873 to 1892 was $2,322,339,700, while its value, "as measured in gold" was $1,916,402,800—being equivalent to a discount of $405,936,900 or 17½ per cent., instead of 50 per cent, making a difference of something over $755,000,000.

So far as the world's stock is concerned, Mr. Scott doubtless knows that it is only when silver is employed in international exchanges or in the industrial arts that it is estimated at its bullion value in gold and subjected to a discount. But in all countries where it is the legal standard, as well as in countries having a "limping" standard, as in the United States and the States of the Latin Union, it circulates as money at its full legal parity with gold. And to the extent of $630,000,000, which represents the subsidiary silver in circulation, it is current at nearly 7 per cent. more than its bullion value in standard silver coins.

Of the $4,070,000,000 silver currency in circulation, according to the Director's last report, $1,900,000,000, or nearly one half, is held in Oriental countries where it is the "Standard of Value" and cannot, therefore, be at a discount in domestic commerce. While over $1,720,000,000 is held by the United States, the Latin Union, Germany, Spain and Great Britain, in all of which it circulates at its mintage parity with gold. At no period in history has there ever been such a vast volume of silver coin performing the functions of money. And as proof of this, while the world's produce of silver since 1873, when its alleged demonetization occurred, has been $2,754,452,900, its coinage has been $2,756,423,015. This, of course, includes recoinage. But Mr. Scott knows that it has been persistently asserted by leading bimetallicists that silver has not depreciated, and will buy as much now as it ever would. And to demonstrate that proposition we have been treated to an amount of arithmetical jugglery that might well make Hermann, the prince of prestidigitators, or even an Indian fakir grow green with envy.

The same inferential inaccuracy is apparent in his methods of stating the facts concerning the output of gold. "Let us not forget," he says, "that the yield of gold in California in 1851 was $81,000,000, and in the Colony of Victoria, Australia, in 1853 was $62,000,000, and that these countries are now yielding each only $13,000,000. Mr. Scott of course knows that in 1851, California practically represented the whole of the United States as to its gold output—as in 1853 the Colony of Victoria did the whole of Australasia. Now in 1894, according to the Director of the Mint, the United States produced $39,500,000 and Australasia $41,760,000, being in each case over three times the amount stated by him. And the world's present product far exceeds all previous records. But perhaps the most remarkable statement of all, made by him in this connection, is to the effect that for the 50 years, from 1831 to 1880, the world's consumption of gold "by the arts and manufactures exceeded its production, $96,468,560."

During this period the world's output of gold was $4,245,579,000, and of silver $2,370,343,000, making a total of $6,615,922,000. If he will refer to Mulhall's Dictionary of Statistics under Article "plate," he will find that the amount of these metals consumed in the Arts during this period, in Great Britain and France, which probably represented half of the world's consumption, did not amount to ten per cent. of the world's produce. And again, if he will refer to the same work under the head of "coin," he will find that this author states that the world's stock of coin in 1830 was £313,000,000, or say $1,565,000,000, while in 1880, it was £1,128,000,000 or $5,640,000,000,—an increase of £815,000,000, or $4,075,000,000. If then, the consumption in the arts during this period exceeded the entire production by $96,000,000 as Mr. Scott asserts, where did this enormous increase of "coin" come from? It must be remembered, too, this is not only in excess of the consumption of the arts but of loss by abrasion, shipwreck and all other destructive causes.

Max O'Rell relates a story of an American visitor's description of things seen in Paris that he ought not to have seen, and the humorist after intimating each questionable view exclaims comically, "Where did he go?" After reading Mr. Scott's article I am constrained to ask, Where did he go in his little journey into the world of economies?

To go into the question of the world's Precious Metal Product, and of the influence it is supposed to exert over the products of labor and industry, I have not the time at present. But as the evident purpose of Mr. Scott's article is to show that all existing economic maladies are attributable to "a scarcity of money largely due to the demonetization of silver," and "as the demonetization of silver depreciated its value, so remonetizing it will appreciate its value"—if there is any principle of economic law governing such phenomena, Mr. Scott would undoubtedly confer a lasting obligation upon many earnest inquirers who, like myself, have been groping their way in search of truth through the bewildering maze of perplexing phenomena which surround this subject, if he will reconcile his theories of "Hard Times" as a result of the scarcity of money with the history of financial and industrial phenomena for the last forty odd years. And to assist him in such a task I will here furnish the necessary data so far as it relates to the "supply" of the precious metals to the western world during this period, which approximately represents the "supply" of metallic money and its supposed effect upon "prices" and "general prosperity." Only adding in advance that so far as this country is concerned the amount of money, per capita, at the important dates within this period was in 1851, $13.76, 1873, $18.58; and in 1896, $31.20.

When Mr. Scott shall have answered these and other queries already propounded in my articles in your issues of February 22 and 29, I shall be willing to offer more for his consideration. In the meantime I ask him to consider Lord Macaulay's observation on King James' luckless experiment in brass money for Ireland as follows: "Public prosperity could be restored only by the restoration of private prosperity, and private prosperity could be restored only by years of peace and security"—and I will add, by patient industry and frugality; and offer the suggestion that a Government cannot enrich its people by taxation, nor create values by legislative enactment.

OBITUARY.

MRS. H. J. Stewart, whose unexpected death occurred at her residence last Wednesday evening, will be much lamented and missed in society and artistic circles. For many years she was organist in St. Francis' Church, also directing the choir. At the time of her death, Mrs. Stewart filled the same positions for the Sherith Israel, Dr. Nieto's temple on Post street. In addition to a musical diploma from the Paris Conservatory, the deceased had taken the highest degree at Trinity College, London, and was an able companion in every sense of the word to her husband, the talented musician, Mr. H. J. Stewart.

C. W. Eaton. The death of Charles W. Eaton, the veteran music dealer of San Francisco, deprives this city of another pleasant reminiscence of the Golden Age here—although Mr. Eaton's memory will not fade in the minds of his host of friends. Difficult as investment in the music trade may be, Mr. Eaton made it rather a science than a speculation—in other words, he trusted to his well-trained classical ear, but he ever listened for the popular keynote. For nearly thirty years his establishment, under the Occidental Hotel, was a rendezvous for the great musician visitors here. But old Mr. Eaton was their "cynosure" by reason of his accuracy and resource. For a year past his health has been feeble, and the end was not unexpected.

M. R. F. L. King, lately appointed manager of the Union Oil Company of California, was formerly connected with the firm of Whittier, Fuller & Company for six years. Mr. King is well known in local commercial circles, and it is needless to say that with his business experience the Union Oil Company will be the gainers by having acquired his services.

M. R. Wm. F. Herrin has become the possessor of the famous original painting from the S. & G. Gump Gallery, entitled "Provisions for the Monastery," by August Humborg, of Munich. It will be remembered that this picture was beautifully reproduced in the last Christmas number of the NEWS LETTER.

Pommery Sec.

Of all champagnes, Pommery Sec is most in demand in London and is the favorite at all select gatherings. Among recent prominent affairs it was served at the banquet in Atlanta tendered to President Cleveland, at the dinner in Hamburg given to the German Emperor, and at the banquet in Bordeaux tendered to the President of the French Republic, and was a prominent feature at the dinner tendered to Paderewski at the Palace Hotel, being exclusively served on that occasion. At the various receptions arranged by the Prince of Wales, Pommery Sec is invariably served. By real connoisseurs it is considered the ideal champagne.

PADEREWSKI presented Marsick to San Francisco on Sunday evening. It was generous to Marsick and to us. We responded by braving a Lenten Sabbath, and packing the Baldwin Theatre from foyer to gallery. Marsick's gratitude must have been colossal to have found expression in the selection of Paderewski's sonata, for violin and piano, for the opening number. I regret now, more than ever, that during Paderewski's eventful season we could not have heard his Fantasia Polanaise—that his most ambitious and celebrated work could have had a hearing in estimating him as a music writer. The pieces given have not been impressive, even under the magic fingers of their composer; they lack cohesiveness, resolution, and are absolutely destitute of thematic richness. They are not cheaply stereotyped, nor is the treatment of the limp, equivocal themes lacking in a certain bold, bizarre modernity which grasps the ear agreeably now and then—but the backbone of all music, the melodic invention that, in its overwhelming freshness and novelty, proclaims new and legitimate birth and stamps the sire a creator in his art—this Paderewski's music has not.

The Sonata was not surprisingly disappointing as a work, for we listened to it a year or more ago, at a local concert, without discovering any even ordinary merit; but, uniting as it did, two such eminent virtuosi, its rendition was harrowing and disenchanting in the extreme. Marsick was so intently buried in his music stand that his reading was perfunctory and mechanical; Paderewski was oblivious to every thing but his own part, which he never for a moment subordinated to the softer tones of the violin—which, at the best, plays only an obligato. Marsick had, evidently, never seen the score prior to his advent here, and Paderewski's thundering of the lavish piano part displayed a not much closer intimacy with the music. It was a duo without purpose, unanimity, or imagination.

The Vieuxtemps D Minor Concerto presented Marsick at his best. He is famous as a Vieuxtemps player, and the concerto from its first notes showed what an injustice it would have been to judge him from the Paderewski sonata. Marsick has many peers, yet he has a place among the great violinists of to-day. He has not the immense compelling power of Ysaye (whose recent visit cannot but induce comparison), nor is he tempestuously ardent. His salient charms are pure, delicately articulated tone, and technique clean, unerring and effortless as the throat of a bird. Refinement, intellectual balance, and poetic daintiness give to the song of his bow the natural symmetry of crystallization; the indescribable and unique grace that distinguishes the cameo or marks exquisite as a treasured Dresden china. His tone has no great breadth, yet it never sets a definite limit for itself, rather suggesting power subdued and strength reserved. Fatigued and weary as he was toward the close of Sunday's concert, he avoided the strain and over-tension so fatal to an artist who pursues one climax too many. Weinawski's "Airs Russes" was delicate to the point of fragility; but it had no fortissimos that could not face a crescendo; its notes were valorous and true until the last, and never was the wild reach for the unattainable there to mar the night's memory. No player could nurse or expend his energies with more judicious care than did Marsick. It was the triumph of art over the bounds of physical endurance.

Paderewski, as he warmed to his solo numbers, never played with such passion, intensity and human heart, during any of his previous concerts here. As he gave his last encores the audience became frantic, delirious, in the enthusiasm of its applause—and Paderewski, for the first time, displayed consciousness of the tribute, as again and again his grotesque head bowed, and his pale, weird eyes signaled farewell to San Francisco. Even now I can hear Liszt's 2nd Rhapsodie, as the piano, plastic under his wondrous hands, made strings, reeds and brass sound its superb harmonies and orchestration, giving new life and significant meaning to the hackneyed work.

Paderewski, you are not a composer, but those who are have received a deeper reverence from my heart since you have so well expressed the songs they gave us.

It is a strange irony that Frederick Warde's poorest patronized season in San Francisco should have given us Lear, a character that, played as it was at the Baldwin Theatre on Monday night, should have been chronicled over the country, wherever the telegraph reaches, as a new and distinctive triumph in the histrionic art. King Lear has been practically off the American stage for many years, my only recollections of previously witnessing it in San Francisco are of Sheridan's performances in the early eighties. As Lear, Warde is amazingly and stupendously sufficient. Even his Virginius, the best on any stage to-day, must be relegated to a second place beside the indomitable genius that shines through his Lear. In the splendid equipment of heart and brain that lies in this touching spectacle of a regal mind and a noble heart jarred and crushed by filial ingratitude, he rises to heights that bewilder even one who has long been a sincere admirer of the good he has done for the drama of our speech. There is not a shade in the pathetic, majestic coloring of his Lear that is overdone. His embodiment, from the first, is that of a grand old man whose loving heart has outlived the keen discernment of his mind, his very bearing touched with a melancholy prescient of the sorrow to come. In the curse his righteous wrath is terrible, appalling; and, permeating all the harsh invective, is the lamentable sob of a broken heart. In the storm scene the shifting vagaries of a mind out of tune amidst the weird splendor of the elements made the scene so vivid, so pathetically heart-felt, that one realized an absolute experience of grief in witnessing it. Frederick Warde has achieved a great character—a character that will have its niche in dramatic history. And Lear—broken, pillaged of all the love and veneration of those to whom he gave his all, totters once again before us in his crown and sword of straw; yet he is a King—aye, every inch a King.

The Warde Company gave performances of Damon and Pythias and Julius Caesar on three nights of the week. Warde's Damon is too well known to us to need description; Pythias was exceptionally well acted by Mr. Hermann, and Landers Stevens made a strong Dionysius, giving the address to the Syracusians in the first act with splendid force and effect. Miss Gillette's Calanthe was excellent. Caesar was the most enjoyable of the two performances. Warde appeared as Brutus, giving a rare reading of the part. Hermann may not look the hungry Cassius but he acts him with convincing art and finish. Charles Sutton was Marc Antony, vigorous and plausible, and Stevens made a dignified and impressive Caesar.

Farce-comedy is inevitable. It declined a little last season in competition with the straight variety, but this season finds it as numerous and hilarious as in the old days when the Bush-street Theatre was the home for that class of attraction. A Railroad Ticket is the title under which Freeman's fun-makers promulgate their gags and specialties; it would go as well by any other name, for there are several brisk comedy people in the cast who inoculate the plotless skit with enough merriment to stock several ordinary farce-comedy organizations. Eugene Canfield has, of course, a Hamlet monopoly of the gingery business of the piece, and he carries it with his usual droll and happy spirit. Chas. Grapewin, James Bradbury, Beatrice Norman and several dimmer lights are not very far behind in clever comicality.

Despite a cold that badly handicapped Carleton's singing, Fra Diavolo continued the good work established by the snug little troupe at the Alcazar. Rena Atkinson grows more popular each night, and she sings Zerlina better than the role has been sung here in a long time. The deathless Bohemian Girl finishes out the week, its well-known melodies fitting well the voices of the Carleton company.

Sousa and his wonderful band have come and gone, leaving behind the echo of those brave marches of his that make soldiers of us all. No bandmaster has ever been more universally loved and popularized by the great American people than John Philip Sousa. He keeps his hand on the pulse of the amusement-loving public, and he supplies the melodious, rhythmic jingle so dear to the American ear. In the rendition of popular or martial music he stands unexcelled. Under his mystic baton the great band answers him as would the keys of a mighty organ. Sousa's music is inspiring because it shows such captivating humor in every one of its tuneful measures. His instrumentation is original and always felicitously balanced. Miss Duke, the handsome violin soloist of the concerts, added pleasurable variety to the programmes. She wields a cunning bow, and, for a young woman, brings out a surprisingly rich tone.

The Jobstown horror has been embalmed in a thrilling melodrama, The Midnight Flood, which has run the week at the Grand. The flood seuc, with its bursting dam and the washing away of at least a score of dwellings, is a remarkable piece of stage mechanism cleverly manipulated. Darrell Vinton and a stroug supporting compauy supply the acting. Gilbert and Goldie have each a comedy part in the piece, besides giving several of their iimitable specialties. Next week a masterpiece of melodrama, The Silver King, will be played. It is an excellent drama, and, in the hands of Morosco's company, should be an immense attraction.

Hartman and those captivating 'childreu, Gertie Carlisle and Pearl Landers, have made the revival of Rip Van Winkle at the Tivoli a clever and interesting performance. Hartman's Rip is too wellknown to need further comment than that he plays the character with the same touches of true comedy, and throughout presents a careful, comprehensive study. It is such characters as these that make more pitiable by comparison the line of utility funny business that Hartman usually follows. The cast is good in almost its entirety, and the scenery is bright-looking and picturesque.

A number of new specialties are on the Orpheum programme this week: Les de Fillipes, fresh from their Parisian vaudeville, the Moulin Rouge; the Andersons, who do an amusing plantation act; Mills and Collins, in a fin de siecle version of Pygmalion and Galatea; and Albertus and Burtram, jugglers and club swingers—making four strong teams, in addition to the held-over favorites.

I regret that limited space precludes a complete review of the jubilee Carr-Beel Pop of last Saturday. It was a concert such as we seldom bear from local talent, and I hope that the departure of Mr. Heine for the East will not deter a resumption of these matinees that have done so much to advance our standard of musical excellence.

Hoyt's great success, A Milk White Flag, comes to the Baldwin, Monday, for an engagement of three weeks. The company that introduces the piece to us is an excellent one, including, as it does, Charles Stanley, Lloyd Wilson, George Bean, and the ever popular Frank Lawton. A full brass band and a drum and fife corps are only two of the many novelties Hoyt's militia satire abounds in.

At the Columbia next week, The Wicklow Postman, presented by a company headed by Eugene O'Rourke, Irish character comedian. The great John Lawrence Sullivan, ex-champion pugilist, Paddy Ryan, and "Parson" Davies are among the participants.

At the Baldwin, on Sunday night, Marsick, the eminent violinist, will give a grand orchestral concert. Besides Mr. Hinrichs and his forty musicians, Marsick will be assisted by Mrs. E. H. Palmer, vocalist.

The Alcazar will have a double bill next week, The Michado and Cellier's The Charity Girl, and Carleton will interpolate "Ben Bolt" at every performance.

The Tivoli company will sing The Hoolah next week, with Hartman in the title-role.

A violin recital will be given on Thursday evening, March 12th, at Odd Fellows' Hall, by Mr. Richard Ferrer, who has lately returned on a visit from Europe. Mr. Ferrer is a pupil of Wirth, of Lauterbach, and of Ysaye. At the coming concert he will be accompanied by Mrs. Wightman, Miss Wilcox, contralto, and Frank Coffin, tenor.

A SUGGESTION which has already become a popular theme in Oakland and Alameda County generally, is that a country club after the fashion of Burlingame, only on a simpler scale, shall be started this summer at some picturesque spot near Monte Diablo's numerous cauyons—say around Paradise Valley. The old Colton domain would be an ideal situation could it be procured. The present plans of this proposed club, however, involve only pretty grounds, a comfortable casino, and a common club building, which will be the nucleus of dainty cottages in the future, as at Burlingame. The younger element in Oakland is thoroughly in favor of the scheme, and there is such a plenitude of really active society men in Oakland that, undoubtedly, a club might be fait accompli in short order. Besides, clubs have always been excessively popular in that city, and the magnificent Country Sporting Club, which Harry Houghton and others established over on the Marin and Sonoma shore a few months ago, may soon prove a rival to the big institution near Tomales Bay.

But among the matronly leaders of Oakland society the notion meets with a marked disfavor, and the argument in their opposition is Burlingame itself. They all declare that the Tuxedo of California has shattered to little bits the last fabric of San Francisco's society; that, among its Four Hundred, the prominent bouses are content with an occasional perfunctory dinner to a few solemn friends; that dances are very few and far between, and that the more public functions of the "Society for the Protection of Cruelty to Cotillions," are so distressingly dull and distract that they suggest the stupidity of a national holiday.

In other words, Burlingame is supreme, and thereunto it is that the society of San Francisco has fled utterly and irreclaimably. There, the dance goes merrily; there, are all the Princes—three at a time, once and awhile; there, go all the young millionaires; and there, is to be found the eligible husband. At Burlingame the girls have the "choice of the lot" all "rouded up" and at their mercy.

Now the Oakland maidens anticipate all this, and, in their wicked little pink and white consciences, don't mind one bit what becomes of Oakland's old society fabric, so long as there shall be a new Garden of Eden over by Monte Diablo.

And their mammas lift up their eyes and hands in deepest sorrow, and ask what will become of Oakland's "lunch parties." For this marvelous institution is the real cornerstone of Oakland's social life. I believe it was Mrs. Chabot who remarked, with an expression of intense mock sadness, to a friend, that Oakland was suffering from a terrible depression because, during the past month, there had only been an average of three "lunch parties" a week.

It is de rigueur, by the bye, at these affairs, to have exactly twelve guests, and the pièce de résistance is invariably chicken fricasée. Ice cream is also served.

No wonder the girls want a country club!

An incident of the week was the disagreeable adventure which a Miss Duncan encountered on a West-bound train with a "scalped" ticket. The young lady was on her way from Scotland to visit her uncle, James Scobie, the big railroad contractor. At the very last stage of the journey came in the "scalping" part, and "conductor's justice" was summary. As Scobie had never experienced such a slight to his Clan during all the years from the time when he first began to build stonework at the side of the observant Charles Crocker, far up the road, he girded his kilt and Skene Dhu, and sought the railroad office, where he was consoled by the officials. James Scobie is a unique personage in California. A Lowland Scotchman with a broad accent—filled with "ow's" and "ayes"—he was here in the early "railroad" days, and took a foremost part in the stonework department. At the completion of the road Stanford resolved to abandon Sacramento for San Francisco. There is no doubt that both Stanford and Hopkins (who was following his example) first intended to crown North Beach heights with their palaces; but, finally, Stanford decided to transform the queer ramshackle old cottage on a rock, which had been the residence of Mrs. Stark, the actress (so they say), in early days. This rock had forever been shedding itself into Pine. During the "60's" and early "70's," nearly every winter there would be no thoroughfare there. It was this and the Hopkins' domain which succumbed in magic time to Scobie's executive force. These walls are stout yet, so far as they are en evidence.

But by the time they were completed Scobie was a capitalist, and more than that, nearing the verge of a million. He was "canny" about approaching it, however, and indulged in Market street lots.

Scobie is a curious study. Always a charitable man, his generosity may at any moment be lavished on a Clansman, while he will be indifferent to the undeserving poor. But on his accession to great wealth he plunged into dissipations which have been effectually sustained. The only daughter had married the professor of moral philosophy in Princeton College, and the Wealthy Contractor, being a widower, decided to build him a mansion near the Park—just on the heights above—and the proximity to it was especially endearing, since that other Scotchman, Park Commissioner Joseph Austin, was near by. Scobelikes to skim with him through the trees behind his own swift team. The Cliff and the Beach are nothing to them—they drive where they please.

* * *

But the Art Association would blush should they be permitted to view the Magnate's casts and marble busts which he has distributed through the twenty-roomed house, that he "cassellated" with thick low stone walls. From all parts of Europe has Scobie collected his treasures, and from the Orient, too. But they have cost him so many tens of thousands that they fail to excite the admiration of those visitors who are not really connoisseurs. However, his grand invention is what he calls the "Prophet's Chamber," a remembrance of Elijah, which is a great, sunny bedroom in a southern corner of the mansion, furnished demurely for the entertainment of Presbyterian clergymen who are visiting the city, more especially the McDonalds, the McPhersons, the Grahams, the Campbells, and all else who are of the Scottish "cloth." He keeps up the ancient traditions of a magnificent depository for what the Scotch colony here declares to be the most immaculate Highland whiskey that the coast has ever seen; but at the same time not a fire must be lit in the house on the "Sabbath day;" all meals are eaten stone cold, and there may be no caller whatever admitted, save the visiting "Meenister."

* * *

There have been two or three amusing incidents in the United States Courts of late, which have excited the mirth of the Law Club. But, perhaps the case of Charles W. Orr, accused of having, as second mate of a ship, unduly maltreated one John McDonald, seaman, has not been without its features. The trial has excited considerable interest among the various attorneys, of whom Tom Jewett was one, who, by-the-bye, is a sworn foe of ex-District Attorney Garter's assistant, the rubicund Whitter.

But when the moment of sentence came, an attorney turned to Jewett, who was himself only a looker-on, exclaiming:

"Honestly, they ought to let that fellow off easy!"

"Never! Never!" cried Jewett. "Just see how much he looks like Whitter!"

Before leaving San Francisco, Paderewski called our attention to an item in the News Letter which stated that he now and then took a small glass of Old Saratoga Whiskey just before his performances. This he denies, saying that his technique is due to seven hours a day hard playing and studying. But there are more than seven hours in the day, during which it is necessary to tone the system; for seven hours at the piano is an extraordinary drain on one's constitution. It is then that a small glass of Old Saratoga Whiskey has the most beneficial effect.

Don't fail to chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum after meals. Indigestion fades before it.

THE NEW WHITE HOUSE.

ISOLATED as San Francisco is from the world's great marts, it is nevertheless a well-known fact that, as far as large stores are concerned, hers can compare favorably with the best that London, Paris or New York can produce. We can think of no better example wherewith to illustrate this fact than the White House, on Kearny and Post streets. Having been established as early as 1851, its reputation has become well known to Eastern visitors as well as to our own Californian residents. In fact, the latter, when travelling abroad, often prefer to postpone their purchases until their return here, being assured that at an establishment of its kind they will be able to get everything they want without having to carry it across three thousand miles of continent. Visitors to the White House will have noticed that it has lately been materially enlarged, having absorbed a former adjoining store of spacious dimensions. Increase of business in every department demanded this move, and it is safe to say that patrons will be the gainers by it. The partitions between the two buildings have been removed, and now no traces of the former divisions remain. Taking the three floors into consideration, then, a space of 54,000 square feet has been obtained, tightly packed with the choicest goods obtainable. The chief attraction of the new department is a large silk counter, the only one of its kind in San Francisco, which extends nearly the entire depth of the building. The silks and velvets displayed there are enough to make the most Christian of women envious, being in the latest chameleon shades, and of every variety imaginable. The light over this counter is perfect, thus enabling ladies to see the goods to the best possible advantage. Running at right angles from this long counter, and extending across to the old dress goods department, are other counters for handkerchiefs, fans and perfumery; a counter for the latest in kid, cotton and leather gloves; a counter for trimmings and laces that will make the mouth water, laces such as Valenciennes, Point de Lur, and others like them; a counter where the most elegant ribbons in every conceivable shade and width and quality, and also the most stylish designs in buttons can be had; a counter for all the newest notions, and finally one for the finest of colored cloth goods. In the rear of all this is a counter devoted exclusively to black dress goods, such as Henriettas, Drap d'Almas, Diagonals, Etamines, Cheviots, Mohairs, and such goods with plain or brocaded figures. This counter and that devoted to the silks are unique of their kind in this city, and will be extensively patronized. In the front of the new department one sees the latest in shirtings, delicate neckwear for ladies, and handsome leather goods. The other departments of the White House, of course, retain their former standard of excellence, only they are materially enlarged by the late additions. For instance, the third floor will now have even a larger display of handsome art goods, such as bronzes, fine crockery, modern and antique vases, majolica and crystal ware. The second floor, devoted to ladies' cloaks, will also have more space wherein to show off the latest things in covert cloths, meltous, gorgeous brocaded silk skirts, and all the stylish silk and lace effects in elegant modern wraps. The curtain and ladies' underwear departments, as also those devoted to fine linens and to all the innumerable kinds of printed goods for spring and summer, remain as they were before. The stocks, of course, in each are the latest obtainable, and of the very finest quality. The organdies, dimities, and such light goods cannot be duplicated in any other store in the city. The desire of the White House proprietors has been, and still is, to please all customers, and it is safe to say they will always do it.

Everybody knows the Lurline Baths. Its reputation is world-wide. You can now have the famous Russian bath, including the "Needle" Shower at a very moderate cost. The tubs and showers are the best in the city and the attendance all that can be desired. The tank is filled with fresh sea water nightly.

When a man reaches home after a hard day's work he needs something to give him an appetite for his dinner. The "Argonaut" Brand is one of the finest Kentucky Bourbon whiskeys made and will do its work every time. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market St. are the sole Pacific Coast Agents and guarantee it.

"A Californian Wild Cat Scheme."

This is the straightforward and explicit manner in which the Investors' Guardian, of London, leads off a criticism of the Alina Colony Corporation, which the NEWS LETTER denounced last week as an infamous attempt to rifle the pockets of unsuspecting investors in Great Britain. It is pleasant to note the fact that some papers abroad are disposed to stand in the breach, and warn the readers against such pitfalls as the Alina. It is, of course, useless to expect any unfavorable comment from papers indecent enough to advertise the scheme, but it has so far only remained for one to have the hardihood to recommend it. The same sheet backed up the infamous Union-Gold, alias Cordova, alias Rathgeb, the flex, where thousands of pounds sterling were squandered in the construction of a mill which only started up to prove that the ore extracted was absolutely worthless; the Josephine, on which half a million was thrown away, and a dozen other rotten conceptions of still rottener individuals, and simply for the sake of the few paltry sovereigns spent in printer's ink for promotion purposes. What did all the booming of the Valley Gold amount to, of the Calaveras Con., and the Esmeralda, all of which ended in rank failure through mismanagement and the worst kind of jobbery. If the law had been invoked in any one of these cases, scandals would have been developed of a nature that would have sent one or other of the manipulators to the State Prison for a long term of years.

The Trap Baited For Investors.

The prospectus of the Alina is enough in itself to put any ordinary business man on his guard. The heavier class of investors are in little danger of getting nipped in such a scheme, and prominent firms in this city whose attention has been called to it have already taken all necessary steps to burst the bubble in London. With dried fruit and raisins selling here as low as 2½ cents per pound, and hops quoted at far below the cost of production, the best lands in the State are now being worked at a loss, and yet this select combination of schemers has the brazen effrontery not only to promise dividends within three years on a capitalization of $100 per acre, from what are now absolutely wild lands, but to guarantee it. Of course this, like the 20 per cent. dividends promised by the promoters of the Union Gold and the Valley Gold, is only a bait for inexperienced speculators, to trap them so that they can be bled at leisure in the future. At the price named per acre much could be done in the way of purchase of lands in California which would offer splendid inducements for investment. The owner of the Alina tract would attract considerable attention to himself should he advertise the land for sale in this city at the price he now expresses himself willing to be relieved of it by the British tenderfoot. It is more than possible that it would be considered a dear bargain at one-tenth of the sum named, and after the scheme gets shelved abroad, which it will be eventually, it might be risky to make a bid for the whole tract at anything above $5 per acre.

Gold Mines Are Booming.

California is again in the swim as a mining State par excellence. The industry has assumed a much more healthy condition than it has ever been able to boast of since the historic day of '49. The promoter is rapidly going where he belongs—to the rear—and the mine owner is taking his place with investors who have learned at last the sensible policy of dealing direct and at first hands. There is, therefore, the more chance for a continuance of prosperity, as the money brought into the State under the new conditions is expended, as originally intended, for the development purposes, instead of being switched into channels of no public benefit whatever. The removal of old-time camps throughout the interior is bringing grist to the mill of the mercantile classes in this city, and they are now more inclined to speak kindly of mining than they were some time ago, when they were so eager to condemn the business, and brand any one connected with it as day-light robbers.

Comstock Mining Shares.

An assessment of thirty cents, levied during the week, was the sole feature of novelty to break the dull, monotonous current of events on Pine street. It neither effected prices one way or the other, the levy having been anticipated for some days past, and the only interest taken in the matter was by those who will have to meet it. That it was small they can afford to congratulate themselves, and that is something to be thankful for just now, the way business is going with the majority of people. If it were not for the occasional reminder from the Lyuch Camp, that there was a fight on foot, no one would ever know that the Norcross Company was embroiled in a contest. The claim is made on the side of the outside contestants that a chilly wave will sweep the salary list if the proxy battle goes the right way, which is not pleasant reading for those who now fill positions which are anything but sinecures at the best, and especially in this company, where expenses have been scaled down to a low notch for months past. There is more likelihood that, should the Lynch faction scoop the persimmon, the mine will be closed down until doomsday, or until as long after that as it will take to collect the judgment, which has been coming into the treasury day after day ever since the decision was rendered years ago. The Occidental Mine is looking as well as ever, and it will only take a short time until work is far enough advanced on the 750-level to judge of the future of the property. The new machinery to supply air is now in place, and this will help matters out considerably. As an indication of the confidence which still exists in the future of the Comstock, the manner in which the assessments are paid up can be accepted as the most convincing.

Mr. Hammond Heard From.

After months of silence, during which he was the source of much anxiety to a set of individuals with an everlasting desire for publicity, Mr. John Hays Hammond has at last been heard from. In a telegraphic dispatch to the Government he acknowledges the useful and kindly services of the United States Consul, and speaks of the courtesy he has received from the Boer authorities. This will shut off the possibilities for advertising at his expense which have been indulged in to an extent, and with such a display of ignorance on general subjects, that a stranger would think that the country was a vast kindergarten. Mr. Hammond's personal friends were the only ones who all along felt assured of his safety, and appreciated the true import of the dispatches flying about at the time.

Wise Words From the East.

The Daily Financial News, of New York, takes an editorial view of the mining situation, which will recommend itself as good common horse sense to the average reader. It says: "There seems to be a general disposition on the part of the press, the operators, and the brokers to eliminate the gopher holes and countenance nothing but legitimate mining projects. This is as it should be; as long as mining is kept on a strictly business basis it offers the best inducements for capital in the world. Apply the same principles that you do in your every day business, and your mining investments cannot help but prove profitable."

The Donohoe-Kelly Bank Election.

The annual meeting of the Donohoe-Kelly Banking Company was held on Thursday last, and the following officers were elected to serve for the ensuing year: Adam Grant, President; Joseph A. Donohoe, Vice President; James A. Thompson, Cashier; Edward Donohoe, Assistant Cashier, and John Birmingham, Geo. Whittell, Eugene Kelly, Irving M. Scott, C. D. Guigne (vice J. J. McKinnon, deceased), Howard Havens, and B. F. Dunham.

The Rawhide Bonanza Group.

The latest news from Sonora, Tuolumne County, is most flattering in regard to the Rawhide mine, which is opening out as large as ever on the 900-level. The App mine is showing every indication of being another Rawhide at the depth now attained.

A Good

The Times-Index, of San Bernardino, notices enthusiastically the employment of General H. I. Willey as consulting engineer to the "Hughes Lytle Creek" reservoir project, and predicts its early completion.

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

MAX Popper lately remarked that "the greatest temptation to the Board of Supervisors has come from the Spring Valley Water Company" and advocated its "removal from the local legislative body" on account thereof. Verily, this gentleman with an effervescing and mirth-provoking name judges everybody by himself. The company in question only needs a fair show, and the Supervisors are all right. As for Popper, who was hand-in-glove with Buckley; who wallowed in the Democratic trough and got fat thereby; who took street sweeping contracts, and out of the profits paid a subsidy presumed to reach people in high quarters; and refused to appear before a Grand Jury lest he might criminate himself—he is hardly a fit person to express an opinion on such matters.

THE virtuous Dr. Brown has revealed that "within half an hour" after leaving Mrs. Freuch's with his wife and Mrs. Stockton, whither he had gone to force the latter on to the stage in the famous "Turkish tea," the graceless female did something to him which convinced his grace-chastened mind that she was no better than she should be. If that was before she sent for him to her room and threw her Delilah arms about his neck, why did he subsequently go to her room? And, if it was after that shocking room incident, how had he the wickedness to try to compel the pious Mrs. Freuch to accept her? The virtuous Dr. Brown, it will be seen, is in a fix which earns him the sympathy of all liars, regenerate and unregenerate.

THE Congregational preachers discussed the press at their meeting on Monday last, and they couldn't have chosen a better time. The press' sins are so many and flagrant, and necessarily so annoying to the guardians of morals, that surprise is excited by the mildness of the reprehension expressed by the brethren. It is to be regretted that Dr. Brown was unavoidably absent. Had he been there he would have done justice to the theme. And it is unfortunate that denominational lines prevented the presence of Brother Colburn and the utterance of his views. Timely topics seem to be the strong hold of the Congregational shepherds.

THE student of morals is aware: First, that University towns are exceptionally giddy; and, second, that environment has an enormous bearing on conduct. Hence we see that it is to the corrupting effect of residence in Berkeley that we must attribute the transformation of the once good and discreet Judge Campbell. It was deplorable enough that he should invite Mrs. Stockton to a French dinner (which he certainly never would have done had he continued to live on this side of the bay), but that he should go and tell about it afterwards—ah, that was so very like a freshman that the influence of the University is apparent to the meanest understanding.

DR. POND, by his defense of Durrant and the Overman person, has succeeded in getting the quizzical public eye focused upon himself. Verily, this reverend gentleman is of so simple a disposition that his name sounds too vulgar for him. He should be a Pool—a sweet, clear, babbling Pool.

A Book of the Week.*

The cleverness of Mrs. Atherton's works appears to be of the intermittent order. She scintillates like a flash light for a time and we blink at her brilliancy, and then, again, we find ourselves in gloom. In her last story, "A Whirl Asunder," there are passages which remind us of her old-time power; there are, also, evidences of heaviness, and almost of degeneracy. In her earlier works she depended, as a good writer should, on her power of placing her words before us in language true to nature, but here we see the symptoms of decay, because she appeals to our lower passions, and writes in language suitable for the divorce court or the race track. "Vigorous" language is as sure a sign of an unbalanced mind in a novelist as vulgar emphases are of the growth of the influences which control the pot-house in the man of the world. And that Mrs. Atherton can write "vigorously" is undeniable. At times she uses her pen as one would a sledge hammer, but in "A Whirl Asunder" she is not only "vigorous," for she is indecorous as well. We do not remember having read a book for some months that is more calculated to excite young men or young women than this one. Some people may, indeed, think the outbursts of passion in the book are merely realistic, but we think them vulgar. According to our ideas, the heroine of the book, Helena Belmont, is a degraded variety of Bret Harte's "M'liss" and "Miggles," and, if we are right, Mrs. Atherton's book will be generally condemned; for no one will contend that "M'liss" and "Miggles" were to be admired for their refinement or culture. In fact, Helena Belmont suggests the word "sensational," and, while the portrayal of the sensationalist in literature may, and often does, demand exceptional skill, this skill is something that Mrs. Atherton does not give us in "A Whirl Asunder." It does not require much ability to picture a woman who, for passion's sake, courts the society of the men and puts temptation in their way, as Helena Belmont does. Indeed, no more disingenuous ingenue was ever put into a book of fiction. She offends her friends, insults her enemies, and outrages the social customs of her surroundings to an extent that would make a woman in real life shunned as a leper. What could have tempted Mrs. Atherton to picture a young woman of Helena Belmont's waywardness, and make a heroine of her, we cannot imagine. Just think of a girl making a man sit up with her all night in a red-wood forest! And yet this is what Helena Belmont does to a young Englishman, who, however, proves to be more than a match for this woman of outrageous ways. She knows that for this young man is engaged to marry her friend, and yet she tells him that he hasn't nerve enough to kiss her! She was tempting him, and she succeeded in making him kiss her in public. She fascinates, but it is the fascination of Satan, and the young man remains faithful to his fiancée; the friend of Helena Belmont, Mary Gordon.

But Helena Belmont knows no friendship, no honor, no truth, and she determines to compromise the young Englishman so that he will be forced to marry her. At least this is what we are to infer from her conduct. The young Englishman was weak enough to agree that "they should love each other for two weeks." And so "for two weeks" mouth is pressed to mouth, and Mrs. Atherton works on the passions of her readers in a way that reminds us more of the haunts of the demi monde, and the character painting of Dumas the younger, than that of an honest woman writing for honest people. We can fancy young people, after reading this book, having their passions aroused; for this work, instead of cultivating a desire to control them, does all it can to bring them into play. Helena Belmont even traps the young Englishman into her dressing room—in fact, when in her "nightie," with her hair down and other ugly surroundings. She intended to have him caught, and she hoped by this means, to be able to break off his engagement with Mary Gordon. And what happened there—? Well, that the reader must find out. But she fails, after all, and this is the one redeeming feature in the book. The Englishman is true to Mary Gordon, although he does not love her, and the machinations of Helena Belmont fail. Women of this kind may be what the Germans call "anatomically chaste," but they are mentally immoral. They are more dangerous than the strumpets who walk Market street, and Mrs. Atherton cannot add to her reputation by making a heroine of one of them. The Englishman is finally killed, and does not marry either his temptress or his fiancée. And so we close the book, glad, however, that we read it in order that we may label it "Dangerous and Unsafe."

"A WHIRL ASUNDER," by Mrs. Gertrude Atherton.

William Dean Howells in his last book, "The Day of Their Wedding," would have us believe that a young Shaker marries another Shaker, and, after the ceremony, they give each other a formal embrace in public and then part to meet as man and wife no more. The idea he wishes to convey is that habit and environment may be stronger than love. Of course, the story is well told, but it is contrary to nature. It is, in fact, "fiction" in more ways than one.

When we say that certain men are "students of international law," the inference is that they are profoundly wise, wear goggles, and spend their days among the dusty volumes of neglected book shelves. But any one who takes the trouble to read Professor Moulton's treatise on the subject, will find that international law is not a difficult subject to master at all.

The Westminster Gazette prints the following, with apologies to the shade of Dryden:

"Two Alfreds in one generation born
The Laureatships of England did adorn;
But Nature found the first throes so exhausting,
That after Tennyson she bore an Austin."

"The Bible in Literature" may well be compared in beauty to the poems of Wordsworth, the plays of Shakespeare, the essays of Bacon, and the histories of Motley all in one. Professor Richard G. Moulton's book on this subject is an admirable illustration of the unthought-of literary beauties in the Book of Books.

The Publishers' Circular shows that in Great Britain the output of books is as follows: Sermons, one volume a day; novels, five a day; educational books, two a day; art and science, two every week; histories or biographies, six a week; and law, one every two weeks. Total for the year, 3466.

THE recent announcement of the engagement of young Walter Hobart to beautiful Miss Hannah Williams has been so long surmised in the swim it naturally has not occasioned surprise therein. Some few there are who professed not to have believed it would ever come a matrimonial knot, but the great majority are simply delighted, and the young couple are overwhelmed with congratulations on all sides. Mr. Hobart is to be specially congratulated, not only for having won so beautiful a girl for his wife, but for his wise selection in other respects. Not alone is Miss Hannah Williams blessed with exceptional good looks, but she is a lady born and bred, of charming disposition, and generally beloved by her friends. That she will add lustre to the name which the young millionaire will bestow upon her goes without saying, and society may consider itself fortunate in a future hostess whose tact and breeding will adorn the position great wealth will bring her.

It begins to look as though a match was not only possible but decidedly probable between an auburn haired millionaire and an auburn tressed daughter of one. If this prove true we may look for more "announcements" in the Eastertide, as matrimony, once started, becomes epidemic in the spring, when the poets tell us "the young man's fancy turns to love."

Widower Hugh is another in society's ranks who is credited with matrimonial intentions. Every one on the inside has known for a long time of the tendresse existing between him and the gazelle-eyed daughter of the capitalist, but only recently has it been said that his suit has been favored.

Every one hopes that the suit against the estate of the late capitalist, Charles Mayne, will not result in depriving the charming Miss May Hoffman of the legacy left her by that gentleman. The young lady has been warmly welcomed upon her return from the East.

One would be led to suppose either that Mr. McMullin passed his wife's house at stated periods only, or that Mrs. Virginia McMullin passed her days on the look out, as he states that every time he gazed on his son at the window the mother pulled him away!

On dit, the eldest daughter of the house of Hager has at length concluded to bestow her maidenly affection upon a worthy son of a wealthy sire. Rumor has for so many seasons been busy in the bestowal of this charming young lady upon different admirers in turn, but without any reason, that society has been chary in believing what gossip said. But it appears that the latest item is serious.

An amiable young matron, now a resident of the rural districts, has been doing her best to bring together the scions of two of the "old set" families in the holy estate of matrimony. According to gossip, her efforts seem likely to be crowned with success, and what a following she will then have! There's Emily, Bessie, Lily O. and Lily L., Fanny, Jessie, and Sue—all her great favorites, and each one ready to smile when the matron says "do."

"You tickle me and I'll tickle you" seems to be the translation of the effusive gush exchanged between musicians of late.

The girls say the Hohart engagement ring is as gorgeous as a locomotive headlight. Now they are wondering if Emily will take J. D. or J. A., both being devoted; though now that Miss Laura is back the former will not be so free to lavish his devotion.

THERE are only two topics current this week—La Loie Fuller and the Spiritualists' Convention. It is true that they are as widely apart as the Poles, but they have nevertheless one thing in common—the power of drawing big houses. At the Madison Square Garden there was an assemblage of several thousand yesterday, most of them firm believers in spiritualism, and a very interesting crowd it was. Coarseness of feature or demeanor was in the minority. The prevailing types were characterized by dignity and sweetness, and they all looked very bappy. Cora Richmond, the inspirational speaker, presided, and there were numerous mediums present, who gave "tests," which seemed cutirely satisfactory to those who received the messages. It is surprising to find how very widespread the interest, if not the faith, in spiritualism has become, and its adherents number many men of scientific and literary renown.

The other eugrossing topic—La Loie—is the pivot on which turns at present all the success at Koster & Bial's. This young woman is a fine example of what perseverance will do. Nature did not make her beautiful, but she gave her brains and a will which have served her well. I understood that she is to receive sixteen thousand dollars for her three weeks' engagement at the music hall, which is not bad for a small young woman. Her new dances are marvels of beauty. It is in the arrangements of the electric lights that the novelty lies, for the serpentine dance, so called, is always the same, and for that matter is no dance at all. The costumes worn by La Loie are very beautiful, but it surely requires enormous muscle to manipulate eighty yards of cloth, which is the measure, I believe, of one of her gowns. The rainbow dance, in which prismatic colors are flung on the figure, has been made familiar here, but the dance of fire is entirely new, beautiful, and startling. Lost in the whirl of draperies, the slender figure seems enveloped in flame; waving sheets of fire encircle her, tongues of flame shoot out in every direction in obedience to the dancer's movements, and one holds one's breath, half fearful of seeing her consumed before one's eyes. It is her most successful effort. I hope you may see it.

Something of gossip has been in the air since the announcement a few days ago that the sisters of the late Mrs. Charles Osborn—Howell Osborn's mother—were contesting Mrs. Osborn's will. It seems rather late in the day for a contest to begin, since the lady died five years ago, and Howell, her chief heir, just a year ago, but the contestants seem determined, and assert that they have a very strong case. One of Mrs. Osborn's sisters is Mrs. Henriques. Her husband, "Billy" Henriques, was assaulted by the well-known clubman, Frank Ellison, a few years ago, since which event Mr. Ellison has been "doing time" in gloomy Sing Sing. Her daughter, Mrs. Leila Neame, is the heroine of a divorce suit in which Ellison figures conspicuously. Should the will be broken, I fancy the gentle Fay will assert her rights, since there remains no manner of doubt that she had long been not Fay Templeton, but Fay Templeton Osborn. She is singing at the Olympia still, and is, as usual, an immense card. I see her now and then in the Park, in a smart hansom drawn by a dashing pair of grays. She is very handsome nowadays, having got rid of her superfluous flesh, and regained her shapeliness.

It was generally thought that the Huntingtons had abandoned the idea of living in New York, and that they were going to sell the house, Charles Yerkes, the Chicago millionaire, being spoken of as the probable purchaser. The wedding party on Tuesday was not large, and there were few guests outside of the families of the bride and groom. The young people have gone South for their honeymoon.

DEAR EDITH—The sunshine will bring the colors to the front again. This is good news, indeed; and, I understand, will apply to the trimmings for the hats we can wear for the season. One of the most attractive little hats I have seen is made of bright green straw, draped with green and white tulle, and trimmed with white gardenias and a group of white quills. Gardenias are the favorites to-day, it seems. Another pretty hat of the same kind as the other is of violet straw, with the open brim trimmed with three bunches of different colored violets, either side being decorated with erect loops of mauve and green ribbon. From Paris I hear that the floral toques will make their appearance again, a favorite combination being violets with scarlet geraniums, the latter flower being used osprey-fashion. Furthermore, I hear of trimmings made entirely of different colored roses in combination with azaleas. Primroses are also much used as decorations this season. Every girl in the city will look pretty now, dear, won't they?

How glad every one will be if the big sleeves are really doomed. Recent designs show the billows of fabric held in to almost arm smoothness; they have slipped down, too, in their starting point, proclaiming a return to the tapering shoulder effect, and the drooping fishu trimming that comes with them seems to indicate that the pointed Louis Seize bodice is only a question of a little time. When that arrives we shall forget that halloo sleeves ever were.

I saw a pretty walking gown yesterday. It is made of zibeline, in the stylish green, and the whole front breadth consists of a deep box-pleat, quite narrow at the top, broadening as it reaches the bottom of the skirt. On either side of it are laid box-pleats, flaring at the bottom, covered, before they are pleated, with hraid beginning high on the sides and sloping down in front to end under the box-pleat. A tiny belt of black satin, scarcely more than a thread, goes across the two pleats to finish them in front, and these are, furthermore, decorated with five huttons, three on the skirt and two on the corsage.

At a tea last week, I saw a very handsome silk worn by a graceful girl there. It was in chameleon effect, throwing the colors of violet, green, and brown. It had a full godet skirt lined with violet silk and a full blouse bodice. The skirt was trimmed about the bottom with a little puff of the silk, and the flounce was trimmed with hretelles of brown glace ribbon, with a green cord edge. The sleeves were in full elbow puffs, and had lower sleeves of fine green gauze made into little puffs and extending over the hands in little frills. About the throat the girl wore a sweet ruche of brown gauze, and the whole effect was admirable.

One thing I am thankful for is that the weather allows us to wear our black silk alpacas again. Black alpaca is the ideal for a spring dress. The newest make of this has somewhat the surface of a coarse canvas, but is exceedingly lustrous. The white silk linings for dresses have already begun to show signs of degeneration, turning to a faint pearl-grey, which is anything but attractive. However, I think that the white silk linings will soon come back again; indeed, I intend using it in my black alpaca, that is to say in the bodice. For the skirt I contemplate a Brodingnagian check in black and white and yellow.

Speaking about yellow reminds me that there is a new yellow, called the Regent—after the mother of the little King of Spain. It is of a very light tint and will be much used in spring fabrics.

Violet water perfumes will be the fashionable ones this year. One very beautiful essence, said to have the exact odor of the real flower, is being sold at $4 50 per ounce. One hundred double violets are required to produce one teaspoonful of the perfume. Just fancy! Make Jack huy you a hottle, dear.

AN OLD SONG.—E. B. PECK IN DETROIT FREE PRESS.

THE first love is the best love,
And through the changing years
Wherever I may wander,
My first love's face appears,
Within the shrine of memory
No other face may rest
Upon my heart as hers does—
The first love is the best.

The first love is the best love:
No other voice as sweet
Comes softly with fond cadences
My happy ears to greet,
As hers, with accents tender,
That once my name caressed.
Dear heart, still unforgotten—
"The first love is the best."

The first love is the best love,
O sweetheart, dear to me,
Who, by my side unfaltering,
Hast kept so faithfully;
When in my face you smiling look,
Your eyes make manifest
That rare, true song of days of old;
"The first love is the best."

LYRIC.—ROBERT HERRICK.

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles to-day,
To-morrow will be dying.
The glorious Lamp of Heaven, the Sun,
The higher he's a-getting;
The sooner will his race he run,
And nearer he's to setting.
That age is best, which is the first,
When youth and blood are warmer;
But being spent, the worse, and worst
Times, still succeed the former.
Then he not coy, but use your time;
And while ye may go marry;
For having once but lost your prime
You may forever tarry.

LYRIC.—S. M. CROKER.

Girl of the blue eye,
Love me! Love me!
Girl of the dew eye,
Love me!
Worlds hang for lamps on high,
And thought's world lives in thy Lustrous and tender eye,
Girl of the blue eye, love me!
Girl of the low voice
Love me! Love me!
Girl of the sweet voice,
Love me!
Like the echo of a hell,
Like the babbling of a well,
Sweeter! Love within doth dwell.
Oh, girl of the low voice, love me!

TO-NIGHT.—KATE FIELD'S WASHINGTON.

To-night I almost envy you
Your quiet bed that seems Too narrow for the coming in
Of any noise or dreams.
So when the earth is not too hard—
A moist and pleasant mold—
With daudleions here and there,
Like scattered bits of gold,
Then maybe I shall break my way
The earth and grasses through,
And smiling with my drowsy eyes
Shall come to sleep with you.

IN the year 1360, three Armeuian monks, of the Order of St. Basil, applied to King Edward III. for protection from the Pagans. The chronicles of the period thus word the end of the letter: "Wherefore we can no longer dwell here, as they do most cruelly slaughter our kind; and we pray the King and his Keeper to save us from the cruel Mussulman."

—The family fortune of the Gladstones was made in British Guiana, where his father owned a great sugar estate, and was also a large slave owner. One of the first speeches made by the Grand Old Man was in defense of West Indian slavery just before the passage of the act abolishing it in 1833.

—Mme. Pasteur and her daughter were the devoted helps of the late scientist during his investigations of the silk worm epidemic of 1849. Pasteur would often refer to them as sharing the honor of his great discovery. A statue is to be erected to his memory at Melun, near Fontainebleau.

—Shortly after Stepniak's death, in London, the Russian papers began to fill their columns with articles about the great Nihilist. It was he who assassinated Adjutant-General Mezentsoff, the chief of the political police, by stabbing him in the streets of St. Petersburg, in 1878.

—Dr. Fridjof Nansen, the Arctic explorer, is not yet forty years of age. For three years previous to his present voyage he devoted his entire attention to the branches of science most likely to be of service to him. He has been gone about three years on his present voyage.

—The Marquis of Salisbury was 66 years of age on February 4th. He spent fifteen years in the House of Commons, and then sat for twenty-four in the House of Lords, and is one of the greatest statesmen who ever guided the destinies of England.

—Josephine's yearly dressmakers' bills amounted to $30,000, which was a greater amount than Marie Louise or Queen Hortense ever dared spend. The fashionable dressmaker of that period was Leroy, whose creations equalled those of the late Worth.

—Dr. Burggrave, of Ghent, has passed his hundredth year, and is now engaged in writing a book on longevity. A contented mind and a happy heart, he holds, prolong life more than dieting and regular hours of sleep.

—A unique collection of 1000 volumes relating to the history of women in all lands and ages, has been presented by Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson to the Boston Public Library. The collection was begun in 1846.

—Few people have had the opportunity of tasting the flesh of the iguana, or big lizard, of South America. The thick tail is considered the most delicate part, and has a flavor between that of chicken and rabbit.

—Mme. Bernhardt intends having a yacht built with a saloon that can be used as a theatre where performances may be given at various ports. She contemplates a trip to India in the near future.

—The Shah of Persia owns a small cube of gold covered with strange Oriental letters and characters. It is supposed to have fallen from Heaven during the time of Mohammed.

—Mr. Rider Haggard is about to leave England for South Africa again, having a new novel in contemplation. He was lately elected chairman of the Incorporated Society of Authors.

—Miss Ethel Reed, of Boston, who is shortly to marry Philip Hale, the son of the Rev. Dr. E. E. Hale, is said to be the greatest woman designer of posters.

—Bismarck claims that a well formed lower lip indicates perseverance. When it is developed to excess it shows willfulness.

THE bicycle has been put to many uses already. Dr. Hoenig, a German physician, has constructed a machine which he calls the cyclo-ambulance. It is a canvas-covered car, containing a litter, and rests on four wheels, and has another wheel in front to be pedaled by the cyclist. If necessary, another cyclist can be accommodated at the rear. The top of the car can be taken off and the patient laid on the litter. A glazed window permits the cyclist to watch the patient, and an aperture in the side of the car affords access to him when he needs assistance. The Berlin papers state that the machine is in use there and can be guided about the streets with apparent ease.

THE action of the Mutual Accident Insurance Underwriters, agreeing that bicycling is a hazardous occupation and must be covered by an increase of premium, is open to criticism. Few accidents occur, and a good bicyclist is less liable to accidents than a man who does not ride, because he becomes naturally cautious. The Life Insurance Companies will surely be the gainers in the long run, because the race will be materially benefited. Proper use of the wheel is one of the best cures for insomnia, incipient nervous prostration, and the ills that follow overwork and long hours in confined occupations. Many a doctor's bill can be saved by judicious exercise.

THE following table of gears for 23-inch wheels will be of service to many riders.

Rear sprocket.	Driving sprocket.	Gear in inches.	Rear sprocket.	Driving sprocket.	Gear in inches.

THE new folding wheel is meeting with genuine approval. To dwellers in flats it will be a boon, likewise to men who ride down to their office and have no place to store it. The German military authorities are having five thousand built for the use of the army.

It is a fact worthy of notice that women seem to be doing nearly all the riding nowadays. Two-thirds of the wheels manufactured are for ladies, which goes far to prove that they know what is beneficial for them.

Young ladies must not forget that until leap year is over they should always ride on the rear seat of the tandem. To do otherwise will bring bad luck.

FEW artists have met with the phenomenal success which has fallen to the lot of Mr. Charles Walter Stetson, a New England painter who has lately been sojourning in Pasadena. His work began to attract attention in Boston in 1883, where, owing to its color and originality, it immediately commanded a large figure. After that, art lovers all over the country began to pick out his work wherever it was on exhibition and most of the largest private collections in the Eastern cities are enriched by his landscapes or portraits. Mr. Stetson is at present giving an exhibition of his finer work, at Vickery's art gallery, on Post street, which will doubtless be well attended.

To love oysters is to live for ever. The best Eastern and Californian can be had of Moraghan, Stalls 68-70 California Market.

CANDIES.

CANDIES.—Don't leave the city without a box of ROBERTS' Best.

IT almost seems as though the prophecy that 1896 is to be an exceptional year will come true, for snow in March is, indeed, a novelty hereabouts—in fact, has never been known since the settlement of the State—so that San Franciscans might well make the query, “whither are we drifting?” to find themselves in its cold embrace so late in the winter. When the first flakes fell some of our native belles, to whom the article is an almost unknown quantity, cherished visions of possible sleigh rides, of the delights of which friends in the East have filled their imaginations; but, alas, the snow for them proved but a fleeting show, much to the gratification of the majority, it must be said, who gladly welcome the sun instead.

It goes without saying that the topic of the week has been the announcement of Miss Hannah Williams' engagement to Walter Hobart, which has been a foregone conclusion for some time past, and, therefore, scarcely a surprise when it was at last made known to the public. An elaborate dinner given by Miss Ella Hobart was the medium chosen for conveying the information; it took place last Friday, and was a most charming affair, twenty-four being seated at the beautifully appointed table, all of whom received the news with many expressions of delight and warm congratulations for the happy couple. The wedding will take place at an early date, and will, it is understood, be on a grand scale.

One of the events of last week was the very pleasant reception given by Mrs. James and her daughter, Mrs. Walter Graves, at their residence on Howard street, on Friday evening. The rooms were handsomely decorated; there was dancing and an elaborate supper at midnight, after which dancing was resumed for a couple of hours. On Saturday, Miss Jennie Catherwood gave a jolly little informal tea d'adieu, prior to her departure South; but the one which was to have taken place at Mrs. Robert McLane's on the same day, was, owing to that lady's illness, indefinitely postponed.

Dinners, luncheons, and receptions in honor of engaged couples have been the rule of late. Of the former, Miss Stella Greenebaum and Alfred Simon were the chief guests of Mr. and Mrs. I. N. Walter and Mr. and Mrs. Louis Sloss, as was also the fair bride-elect at Miss Helen Schweitzer's luncheon party, while Mrs. Ehrman's dinner was in honor of Miss Jennie Schwabacher and Charles Rosenbaum, for whom also Miss Minna Schwabacher gave a theatre party on Monday evening, followed by supper at the Maison Riche; and this evening Mrs. Schwabacher gives a reception at her residence on Jackson street. Miss Ella Goodall's luncheon was in honor of Miss Fanny Crocker, and Mrs. Homer King's guests were invited to meet Miss Mattie Whittier. The recent dinner given by Mrs. Schwabacher, of Clay street, was in compliment to Mrs. Max Oppenheimer, of New York; the Sbarboro dinner, on Friday last, was a farewell to the officers of the Christoforo Colombo, after which there was music and dancing. Mrs. George Pope's dinner was a welcome home to Miss May Hoffman, who has been spending the winter in the East, and, par parenthese, other absentees will soon be with us again in the persons of Mrs. and Miss Regua, and Miss Julia Crocker. Mrs. H. M. A. Miller's luncheon, at the University Club, was for Miss Jennie Sherwood, of Spokane.

There have been a number of pleasant gatherings this week. The Forum Club, in the Maple Room of the Palace, listened with delight to the “talk” of Fred Warde on Monday afternoon, who chose Shakespeare and his works for his theme; and on Wednesday afternoon lectured on the same subject at Golden Gate Hall for the benefit of the Woman's Exchange. Assuredly a novelty, and a pleasing one, too, was the Oriental musicale at the rooms of the Presbyterian Mission, on Sacramento street, last Monday, which were prettily decorated with American, Chinese and Japanese flags, lanterns, and bric-a-brac, while the gorgeous attire of many of the Chinese visitors added in no slight degree to the general effect. There were recitations, music vocal and instrumental, taken part in by Chinese, Japanese, Siamese, Armenians, South Sea Islanders and Syrians, tea and Oriental refreshments, and the visitors both afternoon and evening voted the affair delightful. The ladies of the New Jerusalem Church, on O'Farrell street, gave an “old maids' tea party” in the parlors of the church last evening. To-day Mrs. Curtis-O'Sullivan will hold an exhibition of her paintings in her old studio on Montgomery avenue, to which a large number of cards have been issued. In this connection it may be said that it is with pleasure the announcement is heard that the Guild of Arts and Crafts are to give an exhibition in April.

A pretty home wedding was the one in which Miss Sophie Martin and Julian Liebes were the bride and groom. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Rabbi Nieto at the home of the bride on Franklin street, amid lovely floral surroundings, and in the presence of relatives and a few intimate friends. The bride, who wore an elegant robe of gray satin trimmed with duchesse lace, was attended by Miss Jeffreys Martin as maid-of-honor, who was attired in white organdie and blue silk; Miss Elsie Liebes and Miss Beekie Martin as bridesmaids, who were gowned alike in blue silk and white lace. M. J. Lyon was the groom's best man. An elaborate breakfast was served at the conclusion of the ceremony, and later in the day the happy pair left for a brief visit South, but the real honeymoon trip will consist of an extended tour of the world, on which they will depart next week.

The first wedding which has taken place in the new Synagogue, on Bush street, was celebrated on Wednesday afternoon, when the Rev. Julius Fryer tied the nuptial knot of Miss Selma Altmeyer and Joseph M. Jacobi. Miss Cora Altmeyer officiated as her sister's maid-of-honor, Alexander Jacobi supporting the groom as best man. After the ceremony a reception and bridal dinner was given at the home of the bride's parents, on Turk street.

Next week's weddings will include those of Miss Georgia Wightman and Douglas B. Crane, at St. Stephen's Church, on Monday at noon; of Miss Stella Greenebaum and Alfred Simon, at the home of the bride on Wednesday; and in Oakland Miss Lou Bromwell and Shelby Martin will be the bride and groom who are to be united by the Rev. Robert Ritchie at the bride's home on Madison street.

Recent engagements include that of Miss Anna Duprey and Orville Baldwin, both of whom are yet busy with their studies, and the wedding day therefore some time in future.

Entertainments for the Italian Prince and the officers of the Italian frigate were kept up, afloat and ashore almost to the hour of their sailing on Sunday morning, and included a tea which the Prince gave to a limited number on board the ship on Thursday, on Friday some of the officers doing likewise. Paderewski has also gone from our gaze, but with the promise of coming this way again in the near future. He was delighted with the hospitalities extended to him, not the least charming of them being the violet and daffodil breakfast at Mrs. Alfred Bouviere's, who invited a number of music-loving ladies and gentlemen to meet him and violinist Marsick.

Great interest is being taken by our foreign residents in the bal poudré which will be given at the San Francisco Verein club rooms on Saturday evening next. The balls given by this club are always elegant affairs and eagerly anticipated, and the coming one promises to equal any gone before. It will be a Leap Year party, and entirely under the management of married ladies—wives of some of the most prominent members of the club, who have in store a number of charming novelties and surprises for the guests. The Vaudeville Club of old, which has been resurrected and reorganized for the purpose of Lenten festivities, scored a success in its initial performance. It opened with a swing at the Will Crockers', and, as Dr. Harry Tevis has been heard to express his approval of the programme arranged by Mrs. Kaufman, no more need be said. On dit, that versatile young medico is to have his say regarding several of the meetings of this close corporation in the future, when some startling novelties may be counted upon with certainty.

Mrs. John Boggs and Miss Alice have gone to Colusa, where they will remain until Easter. On their return to the city they will be at the Richeieu for several weeks. Quite a number of our residents are on the eve of departure for lengthened trips abroad. Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Roth and their family expect to leave ere the close of this month, and anticipate an absence of some duration. Among others who sail in April for Europe are Mr. and Mrs. Walter Castle, Mr. and Mrs. William Hnas, Mr. and Mrs. Meyer Ehrman. Mrs. M. Sachs and her daughter, and some young friends who are already on the other side, will make a prolonged tour of Europe and Asia.

Ondricek.

five orders conferred upon him by Queen Victoria, the Queen of Roumania, the Czar of Russia, the King of Italy, and the King of Denmark. Ondricek is also a senior member of almost every important musical society in the old world. Since his advent into America, Ondricek has played with the New York Philharmonic, and Thomas's Orchestra, as well as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with tremendous success. Madam

Amelia Materna, who was proclaimed by the immortal Wagner himself as the world's greatest dramatic prima donna, is too well-remembered to require comment. The Ondricek-Materna concerts will be given at the Auditorium, under the management of Messrs. Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., on March 12th and 14th.

Dr. Luella Cool, who recently returned to Guatemala City, will leave shortly for Quezaltenango to take charge of the practice of Dr. Nyc, lately deceased. Dr. Cool will be the only dentist in that portion of the country.

The wedding of Miss Georgia M. Wightman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Wightman, Jr., and Mr. Douglass B. Crane, of the Occidental & Oriental S. S. Co., will take place on Monday, the 9th, at St. Stephen's Church, Fulton street, at noon.

Rev. Mr. and Mrs. John Hemphill, Mrs. Hoffman and her daughters, and Louis Hersch, of Castle Brothers, are among recent arrivals from visits away from California. Mr. and Mrs. de Young are en route homewards, having sailed from Europe last Saturday.

On Tuesday last a little daughter came to the home of Charles H. Tay. According to latest reports, mother and child are both doing well.

There is another, and a genuine treat in store for the music lovers of San Francisco, in the first appearance here of Ondricek, the world-renowned Bohemian violinist, and Madam Materna, the great Wagnerian singer. In addition to these celebrated artists, there comes also Isadore Luekstone, the pianist. Ondricek is the Court Violinist to his Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Austria, and has had already Materna.

The wedding of Miss Jane F. Masten to Mr. Edwin C. Ewell will take place on the 16th of April. Only members of the respective families and intimate friends will be present at the ceremony.

THE coming Fiesta de Los Angeles is going to be the finest in the history of that enterprising city. One of the street pageants, to take place on the night of April 23rd, will consist of some thirty beautiful floats, each portraying some famous event or characteristic scene in a sun land, ancient or modern, the idea being that all civilization had its birth in some tropic or semi-tropic land. The grand float, of course, will be Southern California—the Land of Sunshine. It is hoped that thousands of Eastern visitors will visit this State during the festival period as special accommodations and rates have been made for them.

English As She Is Wrote In Japan.

The following, says the Japan Gazette, is the translation of a circular issued by the Jikei-Jin, but it should be stated that the translation does not emanate from the hospital:—

PRINCIPAL PURPOSE OF YOKOHAMA "JIKEI-JIN."

The hospital is treating the disease no distinction to the high and low or the rich and poor.

The hospital is named "Jikei-Jin" Charity and it is more happy for the hospital to be last by the sympathy of merciful person.

The affair is proceeding that the house is feeling narrowly and going to add the room for disease but it cannot be done by individual, so it must rely to aid of the merciful person.

And it not only shall pay building expenses but it shall extend the favor to other poor disease and it is the principal purpose.

Soldier who was called to battle field and following coolie not only have done their duty in the shower of the hall and smoke of the gunpowder but there are much more that are wounded, lamed and suffered from cold and heat.

And it is principal purpose of the hospital to protect and help the such one.

Now I am hoping heartily to Ladies and Gentlemen to contribute cheerfully as you like.

One's names who contribute money or the article should be publish by news or other ways.

She Couldn't.

She golfed and hiked and hunted, and she emulated man

In every sport and pastime that a daring woman can;

But despite her mannish style of dress, her place in mannish strife,

She couldn't tie a four-in-hand to save her little life.

—Chicago Record.

"THEN you have learned to love me already?" he rapturously cried. Straight into the eyes of the man with a million looked she. "Yes," she answered, and her words thrilled him strangely, "I was given a thoroughly practical education."—Detroit Tribune.

"WHYFOR eez it zat a woman's face eez used on zee silver dollar in zis country?" inquired a visiting foreigner. "Because," growled the impecunious native, "it is the idiom of our language that money talks."—Detroit Free Press.

MALTA is all very well for the Mediterranean. Our Aleatraz is good enough for us.

A FEW life sentences with hard labor are needed to stop the epidemic of burglary at present prevalent in this city.

IMPRISONMENT for life is a fit punishment for arson. The whole community is endangered by the actions of one man.

IF the gold reserve in the Treasury keeps piling up much longer, it will be necessary to build an extensive addition to that imposing building.

PUBLIC sentiment in England seems to be with Jameson and his men. The Crown, however, takes a different view of the affair, and it is not likely that they will go unpunished.

THE Japanese are studying models of United States warships. They should be bombarded with estimates by our local shipbuilders before foreign competitors get ahead of them.

MUCH praise is due Mr. Cleveland for the caution he is exercising in the Venezuelan affair. The criticism heaped upon him by certain short-sighted jingoes can not effect him in the eyes of intelligent people.

WE are likely to be regaled with much interesting matter in the coming libel suit between an ex-Managing Editor of the Examiner and "Boss" Buckley. San Francisco is kept well supplied with scandals. Let the battle proceed.

CARELESSNESS on the part of the gripman was, apparently, the cause of another accident on the Howard street line last Tuesday. These men, who refuse to stop the cars for gentlemen, should at least be forced to allow ladies to be seated before putting the cars in motion.

LITTLE, if any, importance should be attached to the revolutionary manifesto issued by Canadian republicans advocating the establishing of an independent republic. The majority of the people will not favor such a move and the whole scheme is merely one to create temporary excitement, probably on account of the school question.

WE compliment Dr. Williamson upon the firm stand he is taking in the Alms House matter. The charges against Mr. Weaver are merely trumped up to give the Governor an opportunity of providing Patrick Reddy's brother with a position. They cannot be substantiated and constitute one of the most pernicious cases of persecution we have ever heard of.

"WHITE Hat" McCarty and his son are to be arrested at last for failing to provide provender for a number of their horses on a ranch in Stanislaus County. We do not suppose that anything will ever come of the arrest, but would suggest that the two men, together with the owner of the ranch, be flogged for their brutal conduct until they literally bowl for mercy.

IT is satisfactory to know that at least one Senator is not afflicted with the Cuban madness. Senator Hale's speech will be read with approval by every person who favors law and order, and who deprecates the late outbreak of misplaced sympathy for a gang of unwashed revolutionists.

THE friends of Mr. Sternberg, accused of participating in the last election frauds, are making strenuous efforts to have him released on bail. Taking everything into consideration, we consider the County Jail the best place for Mr. Sternberg, and advocate his detention there until he is ordered to Sau Quentin.

MR. W. F. Herrin delivered a masterly argument on behalf of the Railroad before Judge McKenna in the State Railroad Commission Case on Wednesday and Thursday last. He thoroughly reviewed the law relating to freights and fares and proved that it was the duty of the courts to see that the schedules fixed by the Commission were just and reasonable to all parties.

THE English Home Secretary, after careful investigation into the case of the poisoner, Mrs. Maybrick, has decided that the sentence imposed upon her was just, and has refused to take further action in the matter. It is to be hoped that the members of the Maybrick Defense Association will now have the good sense to accept this decision as final, although they may ever be inclined to consider their own judgment superior to that of Sir Matthew W. Ridley.

WE fail to see any merit in the contemplated policy of wholesale seal extermination. The measure appears to find favor with certain erratic organs and frothy-mouthed politicians, but will certainly meet with the disapproval of all reasoning and tolerant people. Such magnified school-boy policy, put into execution, apparently, out of sheer spite and malevolence, cannot but make us appear ridiculous and contemptible in the eyes of the very nation we wish to intimidate. It is hardly possible that the President, with his clear-sightedness and calm judgment, will sanction the measure to the extent proposed by its originator.

THE recent acquittal of Richard McDonald of the last but one charge against him was only to be expected. The systematic persecution of this gentleman has been one of the grossest outrages we have ever heard of. To keep a man in jail for a period of two years under enormous bonds, when it is impossible to get a jury to convict him, is a method of procedure so shameful as to be almost beyond belief. The precedent having been established, it may be resorted to at any time and anybody is liable to become the next victim. This being the case, the sooner the law is changed and made equitable, the better.
