POETRY.
The Stricken Man.
 In her room, the night was dark,
 The light of evening had departed,
 And she sat alone, her heart
 In agony, her tears were wet, For she had seen the man who Had been her life, and now he Was lying on the bed so cold,
 And she was left to weep and Mourn, and think of all that Had happened, and of all that Was to come.

MISCELLANY.
A Leap for Life.
 William Kirkland looked up and saw the gray voice rose high above the clatter of the machinery.
 There was to be another attempt, he said to himself, to this old machine, to this old engine, to this old mill.

ley as a workman. That brought her in money at last.
 Still the ponderous machinery clabbered and rattled, and she was waiting for the foot of the press to be lowered.

There was no letter yet, "Oh, my father," and then she stood like a thing of marble.
 "I leave you," she said, "I shall be better by myself."

There would be nothing left for her, she thought. For a moment she was so weak that she thought of finding her father to give some of the money to satisfy the debt.
